In offering that amendment I have simply undertaken to incorporate in the bill what the proponents of the bill say in reference to its provisions in regard to appropriations. Of course, I understand perfectly well that there is no appropriation carried in the bill. The only thing that could be done along that line would be to authorize specifically an appropriation. I think it does authorize an appropriation, and I want to call the attention of the Senate to what has already been done in the way of appropriations for this purpose.

I might say in the beginning that so far as the general purposes of the bill are concerned I think everyone is in favor of them. We have been legislating on exactly the same subject, however, for the last 20 years, ever since I have been in Congress and possibly before, and each of those acts has provided for substantially the same thing. Of course, the provisions of the bill have been read but I want to read from the original law providing for the Biological Survey. This is an excerpt quoted from it by the President of the United States in his message on the Budget.

For salaries and employment of labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere, furniture, supplies, including the purchase of bags, tags, and labels printed in the course of manufacture, traveling, and all other expenses necessary in conducting investigations and the carrying out of the work of the bureau—including cooperation with Federal, State, county, or other agencies or with farm bureaus, organizations, or individuals, as follows:

Everything that is contemplated in the bill now pending is covered there. The purposes are the same except expressed in a little different way:

For necessary expenses for general administrative purposes, including the salary of chief of bureau and other personal services in the District of Columbia, $83,135.

Under that bureau there are 37.3 employees. I do not know how they divide their employees in the city of Washington into tenths but apparently the President has so divided them in the Budget message. There are 37.3 employees in the city of Washington to carry out that particular part of the wild game law.

Then apparently there is a chief of bureau at $8,000 and other salaries ranging on down, in all, $78,543, practically all of the appropriation, for employees here in Washington. There is fifteen-sixteenths of the appropriation for the preservation of wild game that is for personal services of people here in the District of Columbia. That is the first division that I have just read.

The second division is as follows:

Maintenance of mammal and bird reservations: For the maintenance of the Montana National Bison Range and other reservations and for the maintenance of game introduced into suitable localities on public lands, under supervision of the Biological Survey, including construction of fencing, wardens' quarters, shelters for animals, landings, roads, trails, bridges, ditches, telephone lines, rockwork, bulkheads, and other improvements necessary for the economical administration and protection of the reservations, and for the enforcement of section 84 of the act approved March 4, 1909 (U. S. C., title 18, sec. 145), entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States," and acts amendatory thereto, and section 10 of the migratory bird conservation act of February 18, 1929 (U. S. C., Supp. IV, title 16, sec. 715i): Provided, That $2,500 may be used for the purchase, capture, and transportation of game for national reservations, $83,913.

That is the second bureau that is established for the preservation of wild life. Let us see how many people are in that bureau. There are 4.1 in the city of Washington and 10.6 outside of the city of Washington. Here is another act passed just like the bill we have before us. It seems to be fashionable to pass one about every year. This one provides:

Food habits of birds and animals: For investigating the food habits and economic value of North American birds and animals in relation to agriculture, horticulture, and forestry, including methods of conserving beneficial and controlling injurious birds and animals, $105,810.

A separate bureau here in Washington is to investigate and report. Who receives the report from this particular bureau about these animals I do not know. Here we have a deficit in the Treasury of $1,700,000,000 to-day, and yet we are asked to appropriate $105,810 for carrying out a suggestion of the President for this bureau relating to wild life that probably has never affected the situation in the slightest. I invite the attention of Senators to the fact that when once we establish a bureau in any one of the departments there is a constant increase in the personnel of that bureau and in the cost and expense of the bureau. They go up like magic.

Ten years ago, in 1920, the Congress appropriated for the protection of wild life in America $742,170.

Mr. KING. That was just for the one bureau.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; just for the Biological Survey. In 1921 we increased that to $785,885. That was a very modest increase. I can not imagine how that happened. In 1922 it was increased a little more, to $823,325. In 1923 it was increased to $870,560; in 1924 it was increased to $872,265 and in 1925 to $957,320. It was growing apace. This was an increase of 40 per cent in five years. Where did it go? It went to the increase in bureau personnel largely here in the city of Washington.

In 1926 it went up to $1,372,768. In 1927 somebody evidently got a little economical and it dropped back to $987,365, but the next year, 1928, it went up again to $1,235,020. In 1929 it went back a little, to $1,170,500, but in 1930 it jumped to $1,509,166, in 1931 to $2,218,320, and in 1932 to $2,229,170.

While it is true that a little less than $1,800,000 is recommended, yet if the bill now before us passes it will go away beyond the $2,218,000 appropriated for last year. In my humble judgment, we have no moral right thus to dispose of the money of the people of the United States when there is a deficit in the National Treasury of $1,700,000,000. We have no right to provide for another bureau in the Biological Survey doing precisely the same kind of work that is now being done. It is indefensible if not illegal.

I come now to the fourth bureau. Somebody stated that this work was not paralleled. It is just an expansion, it is said. However, I believe it is all the same work. If we are going to establish another bureau to do the very work that is now being done there, it is a useless expenditure of money. The fourth provides as follows:

Control of predatory animals and injurious rodents.

I suppose that is for lions and tigers. "Rodents" means rats. Lions and tigers and rats! Of course we would have to get some lions and tigers from another country before we could use much of the appropriation for them, but the rats are with us, and, of course, everybody recognizes that there can not be a higher duty for the American Government than to go out and kill rats and mice!

But just consider for a moment the amount that is appropriated for this purpose—$573,780. Here we have a Treasury "in the red" to the extent of $1,700,000,000, and we have been urged to appropriate for a bureau in this very department $573,780. It is not good business. It is not just to the American people. It is not fair to the American taxpayer, and we ought not to set up another such bureau. There are already 13 bureaus all doing virtually the same work now.

I come to the next one, entitled "Production of fur-bearing animals." Here is the language of the act, almost identical with that which we are now considering in the bill before us:

For investigations, experiments, demonstrations, and cooperation in connection with the production and utilization of fur-bearing animals raised for meat and fur in the United States and Alaska.

It goes right along with the provisions of the bill we are now about to pass.

I come now to the next one:

For biological investigations, including the relations, habits, geographic distribution, and migration of animals and plants.

I suppose plants do migrate. At any rate we have a bureau to tell us whether and how and where they migrate. I have never seen a report from any one of these bureaus as to the migration of plants, but I have no doubt they are busily working on the subject. They have 16 employees in the bureau here in Washington determining how animals and plants migrate.

For investigations of the relations of wild-animal life to forests, under section 5 of the act approved May 22, 1928, and for investigations, experiments, and demonstrations in the establishment, improvement, and increase of the reindeer industry and of musk oxen and mountain sheep in Alaska, including the erection of necessary buildings and other structures, $125,480.

Then comes the next bureau that is established in the Biological Survey. It is almost identical with what is now proposed to establish:

Protection of migratory birds: For all necessary expenses for enforcing the provisions of the migratory bird treaty act of July 3, 1918 (U. S. C., title 16, secs. 703–711), and for cooperation with local authorities in the protection of migratory birds, and for necessary investigations connected therewith, $217,340.

Here comes the next bureau, which is confined to Alaska and for which there is only proposed an appropriation of $155,650.

Then there is another little bureau for the enforcement of the Alaskan game laws.

Then comes still another appropriation and another bureau.

For the acquisition—

Lands are being authorized to be acquired under the act from which I am about to read. We have already legislation of that character. Listen to it:

For the acquisition of areas of land or land and water pursuant to the act entitled "An act to establish the Upper Mississippi River Wild Life and Fish Refuge," approved June 7, 1924 (U. S. C., title 16, secs. 721–731), as amended, and for all necessary expenses incident thereto, including the employment of persons and means in the city of Washington and elsewhere, $34,400, which shall be available until expended, being part of the sum of $1,500,000 authorized to be appropriated for such purpose by section 10 of said act; and for all necessary expenses of the Secretary of Agriculture authorized by section 9 of said act, $46,178: Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture may incur obligations and enter into contracts for the acquisition of additional areas to an amount which, inclusive of the amounts heretofore and herein appropriated, shall not exceed a total of $1,500,000.

This appropriation is for $80,578. One would think that it would be nearly enough to look after the wild life of America; but I come to another law which was enacted by a recent Congress.

For the establishment of a suitable refuge and feeding and breeding ground for migratory wild fowl, including the acquisition of water rights and privately-owned lands pursuant to the act entitled—

And so forth.

And for all expenses incident thereto, including the employment of persons and means in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, the unexpended balance of the appropriation of $75,000 for this purpose.

And then in addition, $32,100.

But even that was not all, Mr. President. Here is an item for another bureau of the same department of the Government:

For carrying into effect the provisions of the act entitled "An act to more effectively meet the obligations of the United States under the migratory-bird treaty—

I do not know what it is proposed to call this proposed act, but I suppose it would be "The migratory bird conservation act." It is all the same; there is just a little difference in language; and it would give the department an excuse to set up an additional bureau with a lot of clerks and a lot of expense.

For carrying into effect the provisions of the act entitled "An act to more effectively meet the obligations of the United States under the migratory-bird treaty with Great Britain by lessening the dangers threatening migratory game birds from drainage and other causes by the acquisition of areas of land—and of water to furnish in perpetuity reservation for the adequate protection of such birds; and authorizing appropriations for the establishment of such areas, their maintenance and improvement, and for other purposes," approved February 18, 1929 (U. S. C., Supp. IV, title 16, secs. 715–715r), $320,000, authorized by section 12 of the act, which sum is composed of $200,000, a part of the sum of $600,000 authorized to be appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932, and $120,000 authorized to be appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and in addition thereto $3,453 authorized by section 18 of the act; in all, $323,453, together with the unexpended balance of the appropriation of $400,000 for the purposes of section 12 of said act as contained in the Agricultural appropriation act for the fiscal year 1932: Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture may incur obligations and enter into contracts for the acquisition of additional areas approved for purchase or rental by the Migratory Bird Conservation Commission provided for in section 2 of said act to an amount which, inclusive of the amounts heretofore and herein appropriated, shall not exceed a total of $875,000, and such contracts shall be deemed contractual obligations of the Federal Government.

Mr. President, I digress here long enough to say that if the President's recommendation is carried out, and this appropriation be approved by the Congress, instead of there being appropriated $2,229,170 as last year, there will be appropriated nearly $3,000,000 for this purpose at this session.

Mr. President, those are not all the bureaus. Here is another one: Cheyenne Bottoms migratory-bird refuge. That seems to be a refuge in Wyoming. There was appropriated last year only $200,000; but the appropriation of $200,000 was not used, and the unexpended balances of $50,000 and $200,000 are reappropriated. The amount we are appropriating this year for the preservation of migratory game will run well over $3,000,000.

Here is another bureau for the same purpose.

Mr. President, under these circumstances it seems to me that by all means this limitation upon this proposed act should be adopted. This limitation proposes to fix in exact language what the proponents of the bill desire, and I can not understand why they are not willing to put it in the proposed law.

I want again, Mr. President, to call attention to the fact that there are 162 employees in these various bureaus here in the city of Washington, drawing large salaries, for the purpose of enforcing this law. The Government is paying them $436,227 a year right here in Washington. They are making investigations in one bureau which no one will ever read; they are making investigations probably without ever making a report. Under various acts, 13 of such bureaus have been established in the departments, primarily or ostensibly for the protection of wild game in America, but really and actually we are building up bureau after bureau every year in the Department of Agriculture. It ought to be stopped, and there is but one way by which it can be stopped, and that is to provide in the bill itself that no appropriation is authorized.

Mr. President, as I understood the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Connecticut, it is agreed that no additional appropriation shall be provided because of this measure. Let us see what there will be added.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. FESS. If the Senator's amendment were put in the bill, would it bind any succeeding Congress?

Mr. McKELLAR. No. If we shall pass this bill, no succeeding Congress will be bound by it; any succeeding Congress may disregard it or repeal it. We can not bind anybody except the present Congress, and that is what I want to bind. I am sorry the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, is not present, for I should like to say to him that what I am seeking to do by this amendment is to prevent the department sending in additional requests for appropriations to carry out the provisions of this bill. Here is what will be done. Listen to this provision in the bill:

That the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of Commerce are authorized to provide expert assistance to and to cooperate with Federal, State, and other agencies in the rearing, stocking, and increasing the supply of game and fur-bearing animals and fish—

That is an unlimited authorization. They could send to Congress an estimate for a million dollars if the bill should be passed and the Congress should be willing to give it. We ought not to make any such blind authorization as that.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. KING. A moment ago the Senator read some of the appropriations for the Biological Survey since 1920. Will it interrupt the Senator if I call his attention to some other appropriations for that bureau?

Mr. McKELLAR. Not at all.

Mr. KING. Merely for the purpose of illustrating how when one cell is created two or three other cells will soon be developed, and still others, let me show how since 1886 the appropriations for the Biological Survey have grown. In that year the Biological Survey received an appropriation of only $5,000; in 1887, $10,000; in 1888, $12,000; in 1889, $13,085.90; in 1890, $15,060; in 1891, $23,864; in 1892, $24,860; in 1893, $24,860, the same as in the previous year; in 1894, $27,360; in 1895, $27,360; in 1896, $27,560; in 1897, $27,560; in 1898, $27,560; in 1889, $27,560; in 1900, $27,560—there seemed to be uniformity in administration and in expenditures under the law during those years; in 1901, $30,300; in 1902, $32,800; in 1903, $45,850; in 1904, $51,850; in 1905, $51,850; in 1906, $52,000; in 1907, $52,000; in 1908, $52,000; in 1909, $62,000. Then there was a special appropriation in the same year of $50,700. In 1910 the appropriation for this bureau was $87,420; in 1911, $86,920; in 1912, $139,700; in 1913, $191,400; in 1914, $170,990; in 1915, $281,290; in 1916, $521,290—nearly double the appropriation for the preceding year; in 1917, $578,230; in 1918, $669,736; and in 1919, $820,472.

The Senator from Tennessee has already stated that the appropriations for last year were more than $2,000,000 and that for this year they will exceed that amount.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think they will exceed $3,000,000 this year, including the unappropriated balances which are reappropriated.

Mr. KING. So, from the modest beginning of $5,000 in 1886, we have this gigantic figure now, which demands more than $2,000,000 for this one bureau.

Mr. McKELLAR. It will probably require more than $3,000,000 for the ensuing year.

Mr. KING. This is merely an illustration of the growth of bureaus and Federal organizations which are set up.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield to me?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. WALCOTT. I am anxious to have a vote on this bill this afternoon. I can not see that the amendment which has been offered by the Senator from Tennessee will do more than estop appropriations during this session of Congress. I do not see why the amendment should not be accepted.

Mr. McKELLAR. That will be entirely satisfactory to me.

Mr. WALCOTT. I am willing to accept the amendment and then I trust we may have a vote on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DICKINSON in the chair). The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee, as amended.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I wish to express my gratification at the adoption of an amendment like that. Without going into the matter at this time, I think hereafter the Senate ought to scan very carefully the bills which come before it with reference to authorizations.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I should like to say that I join with the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] in the view he has expressed. I think that every bill which comes before the Senate ought to be scrutinized in order to see if the appropriations carried can not be reduced. We are obliged to stop appropriating so much money.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I call for a vote.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, as I understand, the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee as amended. [Putting the question.]

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before a vote is taken on the bill I wish the Senator from Connecticut would examine the very long title of the bill. It seems to me it is too long and too comprehensive; and I suggest to him the following as an amendment:

An act to promote the conservation of wild life, fish, and game, and for other purposes.

The purposes expressed here would permit the establishment of forests and would authorize engaging in all sorts of activities. The declaration that this is a bill to insure adequate supplies of wild plant and animal life, including forests, seems to me to be a declaration far beyond the power of the Federal Government. The Federal Government does not have power to insure supplies to individuals or States; and it seems to me the title is entirely too long.

I beg the Senator to accept the title which I have suggested:

An act to promote the conservation of wild life, fish, and game, and for other purposes.

I am sure the Senator will accept that amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I offer an amendment to the title after the bill is passed?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes.

The bill was ordered to a third reading and was read the third time.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry: I do not jeopardize the right to offer an amendment to the title after the bill is passed, do I?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; the time to amend the title is after the passage of the bill.

Mr. KING. That is my understanding.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

Mr. KING. I offer an amendment to the title, which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the title will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the title so as to read:

An act to promote the conservation of wild life, fish, and game, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the title will be amended as proposed by the Senator from Utah.

OPERATIONS OF FEDERAL LAND AND JOINT STOCK BANKS

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the reading of the resolution I send to the desk, and for its immediate consideration. It merely asks for information, and I am sure there will be no objection to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read Senate Resolution 86, submitted by Mr. McKELLAR on the 14th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Federal Farm Loan Board be, and it is hereby, requested and directed to report to the Senate at the earliest possible moment the number of farm loans held by the Federal land banks and joint-stock banks now in arrears, giving the same by States up to December 1, 1931; also how many foreclosures have been made or ordered during the years 1929 and 1930 and 1931 up to December 1. The Farm Loan Board is further requested and directed to furnish the Senate with the number of farms bought in by the various land banks at their foreclosure sales, and the number of farms still owned by the banks.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry: Does the Senator from Tennessee ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. STEIWER. I am wondering if the Senator would permit me to ask a question about the resolution before that question is presented.

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. STEIWER. Does this reference to the years refer to each year severally?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. STEIWER. Or to foreclosures for the 3-year period?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; it asks for information as to foreclosures up to December 1.

Mr. STEIWER. As I understand the reading of the resolution, it referred to a 3-year period.

Mr. McKELLAR. No.

Mr. STEIWER. I assume the Senator would prefer to have the information by years.

Mr. McKELLAR. We do. We get that under the resolution.

Mr. STEIWER. I thank the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered by the Senate and agreed to.

FINANCE COMMITTEE INVESTIGATIONS

Mr. TOWNSEND. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, I report back favorably, with an amendment, Senate Resolution 89, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The amendment was, in line 5, after the word "customs," to strike out "currency, and coinage matters," so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance, or any subcommittee thereof, hereby is authorized to sit during the sessions or recesses of the Seventy-second Congress at such times and places as they may deem advisable; to make investigations into internal revenue, customs, and other matters within its jurisdiction, and to compile and prepare statistics and documents relating thereto as directed from time to time by the Senate and as may be necessary; and to report from time to time to the Senate the result thereof; to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ such expert, stenographic, clerical, and other assistance as may be necessary; and all of the expenses of such committee shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate; and the committee is authorized to order such printing and binding as may be necessary for its use.

VALUE OF FARM CROPS

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I desire to call attention to an article in this morning's United States Daily on the value to farmers of all crops, stating that that value is $4,000,000,000. The article is based on a statement of the Agriculture Department as to December 1 of this year. The value of farm crops throughout the United States in 1929 was estimated by the Agriculture Department to be a little over $8,000,000,000; and, as I have stated, on December 1 of this year it was estimated at a little over $4,000,000,000.

In the last two years, therefore, the value of farm crops has gone down 49 per cent, according to the Agriculture Department. That represents the condition of the farmers to-day.

I ask unanimous consent to have this article printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

[From the United States Daily of Thursday, December 17, 1931]

VALUE TO FARMERS OF ALL CROPS SET AT FOUR BILLIONS—DECLINE OF 49 PER CENT IN TWO YEARS IS SHOWN IN DECEMBER ESTIMATES OF AGRICULTURE DEPARTMENT—CORN YIELD LEADS IN VALUATION DROP—COTTON SECOND IN DECREASE, WITH WHEAT THIRD; ACREAGE CURTAILED BY DROUGHT AND HARVEST FAILURES

The value to farmers of all crops produced in the 1931 season is estimated at $4,122,850,000, on the basis of December 1 prices, in the December crop report of the Department of Agriculture, made public December 16.

The valuation compares with $5,818,820,000 for 1930 and $8,088,494,000 for 1929, the department said, the reduction of 49 per cent in two years being due primarily to reduced prices and affecting practically all crops. The greatest drop in value is in the corn crop, which shows a decline of $1,043,000,000 from the level of 1929, with cotton and cottonseed showing the next largest drop of $854,000,000, and wheat third with $446,000,000, according to the report. The crop report and comment accompanying it follow in full text:

UNIFORM DECLINE SHOWN

On the basis of December 1 prices, the total value of the crops produced in the United States in 1931 is estimated by the Department of Agriculture at $4,122,850,000, compared with $5,818,820,000 last year and $8,088,494,000 in 1929. The decline in crop values compared with two years ago is nearly $4,000,000,000, or 49 per cent. The percentage of decline is rather uniform in all parts of the country except for the very heavy reduction in the Dakotas, due to drought this year.

The decrease is also shared by practically all crops. About $1,043,000,000 of the decrease is in corn, $854,000,000 in cotton and cottonseed, $446,000,000 in wheat, $386,000,000 in hay, $263,000,000 in potatoes, $220,000,000 in oats, and $130,000,000 in tobacco, with correspondingly large decreases for less important crops.

These reductions in value are due primarily to the decline in prices. In comparison with 1930, prices in 1931 are about 36 per cent lower and production of principal crops was 10.1 per cent greater. Exclusive of fruits, the acreage harvested in 1931 was 350,672,000 acres, a reduction of 9,225,000 acres, or 2.6 per cent, from the acreage harvested in 1930.

CROP FAILURES CITED

With acreages higher in most parts of the country, this reduction was due to the tremendous decrease of more than 13,000,000 acres from drought and crop failure in California and five States in the Northern Great Plains, an area equal to approximately 21 per cent of the total crop acreage in those States in 1930. Crop yields per acre harvested in 1931 averaged 11.7 per cent higher than the very low yields of 1930 and 4.1 per cent above the yields of 1929, which were 97.8 per cent of the average yields of the preceding 10 years.

These valuations are based on estimates which have been materially revised toward the production shown by the census for 1929. Except where other enumerations, records of commercial deliveries, or differences in classification justify other figures, the estimates of acreage, yield, and production in 1929 are substantially the same as those determined by the census taken in April, 1930, for the crop season of 1929.

The estimates for 1930 and 1931 have been revised proportionately. This complete revision has not materially changed the estimates of total production of wheat, rice, tobacco, peanuts, beans, sugar beets, broomcorn, or hops, and in general estimates for other crops have been little changed in areas where they are extensively raised for sale. The crops chiefly affected are those which are largely fed or consumed on the farms where grown and for which it is difficult to determine the true level of production.

REVISION DUE TO LOSS

For these crops the revision represents in part a shift from reports based on field-run weight at harvest to production as determined some months later after there has been some shrinkage and loss in curing, cleaning, and culling and some incidental use. This does not affect to any extent comparisons between the revised United States estimates for the last three seasons, but it may affect some comparisons between crops and between States. Pending complete revision of the earlier records, the present estimates for feed crops, potatoes, sweetpotatoes, and some minor crops, are not comparable with the unrevised estimates for years prior to 1929.

A revision from 1919 to 1928, inclusive, is being prepared for the field crops for publication before the beginning of the 1932 crop season.

MUSCLE SHOALS COMMISSION (S. DOC. NO. 21)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed with the exception of the brochure:

To the Congress of the United States:

In my message to the Senate on March 3 last, returning without my approval Senate Joint Resolution No. 49, I suggested that as the solution of the Muscle Shoals problem was a matter of major interest to the States of Tennessee and Alabama, these States should set up a commission of their own representatives to cooperate with a like commission appointed by me to consider the disposition of the Muscle Shoals project.

On March 20, 1931, the Legislature of the State of Tennessee passed the accompanying resolution, which was approved by the governor on March 23, 1931. Under this resolution Mr. Mercer Reynolds, Mr. Vance J. Alexander, and Mr. W. A. Caldwell were appointed members of the commission. As Mr. Alexander and Mr. Caldwell were unable to serve, the governor subsequently appointed Mr. J. F. Porter and Mr. R. L. Moore to fill the vacancies. On June 30, 1931, the Assembly of Alabama passed the accompanying resolution, which was approved by the governor on June 30, 1931, and under it Mr. S. F. Hobbs, Mr. Will Howard Smith, and Mr. W. F. McFarland were appointed members of the commission. On July 14, 1931, I appointed Col. Harley B. Ferguson, Corps of Engineers, United States Army; Col. Joseph I. McMullen, Office of the Judge Advocate General, United States Army; and Mr. Edward A. O'Neal, president of the American Farm Bureau Federation as members of the commission.

Hearings were held, and after long consideration of the subject the commission rendered to me a unanimous report which I now transmit for the consideration of the Congress. In addition, the commission has prepared a brochure showing the evidence on which its recommendations are based. This I also transmit for the information of the Congress.

HERBERT HOOVER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, December 17, 1931.

PROPOSED HOLIDAY RECESS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senate, I would like to make a brief statement with respect to the subject which was under discussion in the Senate a few moments ago on the initiative of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. It relates to the adjournment for a holiday season.

Some days ago I read in the newspapers that the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, Mr. GARNER, had agreed upon an adjournment from next Tuesday until the 4th day of January. At the time that announcement was made in the press, so far as I know, no one on this side of the Chamber had been consulted.

On a later day, while I was in conference with the Speaker of the House of Representatives about other and more important matters, the Senator from Indiana came to the Speaker's room and inquired about an arrangement for adjournment for the holidays. The Speaker said, as I recall it, that the committees of the House would be in session, that some of them would remain in session, and that he would like to have the House meet next Monday and next Tuesday.

Both the Senator from Indiana and I called the Speaker's attention to the fact that there was no business before the Senate, and I now call attention to the fact that there is not a single bill on the Senate Calendar. The only bill which has been reported at this session has just recently been disposed of, and the only resolution on the calendar, that of the senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], was likewise disposed of to-day.

The Senator from Indiana then asked whether I would consent to an adjournment on Friday until Tuesday, with the understanding that on Tuesday the Congress would take an adjournment until the 4th of January, and I did so. My reason for doing that was that I did not believe then that it would be possible for the Senate to transact any business of very great importance within the period arranged at the suggestion of the Senator from Indiana for a holiday. I still think that is true.

I say now to the Senator from Idaho that I do not believe the Senate is justified in remaining in session merely to continue voting on the election of a President pro tempore. If there were important bills before the Senate or if the circumstances indicated that in all probability such measures would be brought here I would recognize the force of the argument that the Senate should adopt a new and unusual custom, deprive itself of a vacation, and continue in actual session. I would even go further than the proposal that there be a vacation for five days. If there were important business to be considered here and disposed of, I would be willing to eliminate the 5-day adjournment. I see no more reason for a 5-day adjournment than for the adjournment which has been tentatively arranged in the manner already stated.

So far as I am concerned, I do not propose to play the game in any other than a frank and open way. I do not see the necessity or the occasion for the Senate staying in session to vote on the election of a President pro tempore unless there is some indication that a conclusion may be reached. I believe that the committees of the Congress, including the committees of the Senate as well as those of the House of Representatives, can transact much important business during the holiday which has been arranged for, and, so far as I am concerned, I propose to abide by the agreement which has been entered into. I do not seek to impose my views upon any Member on this side of the Chamber. If the majority has changed its views, I think I am entitled to notice of that fact. I have received no such notice.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES. The Senator suggested that he understood that we would adjourn from to-morrow until Tuesday. I wanted to call the Senator's attention to the fact that two measures have come over from the House to-day, and the Committee on Appropriations will meet to-morrow afternoon and pass on them. Of course, if we can act on them to-morrow afternoon that will be satisfactory.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. There would not be the slightest objection to continuing in session. But here we are in the situation of having no business to transact, not a measure on the calendar, nobody bringing anything forward. If the Senator from Washington will bring forward his measures, of course we will dispose of them.

Mr. JONES. I was going to suggest that we should not adjourn over Monday; that we could meet Monday and pass those emergency measures.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly. So far as I am concerned, the Senate may stay in continuous session throughout the holidays. I expect to take an adjournment myself, pursuant to the arrangement entered into, but I have not the slightest objection to other Senators pursuing the course which has been proposed by the Senator from Idaho.

I want to say in all frankness that I do not appreciate the course this matter is taking and has been taking. I recognize the right of every Senator here to have just as much control of when the Senate shall adjourn as I have. I acquiesced in a suggestion made by the leader of the majority. I thought I was doing the right, fair, and proper thing; and, so far as I am concerned, I intend to abide by the agreement we entered into.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield to me?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I wish merely to emphasize what the Senator has said, by stating that the major committees of the Senate have been able to meet only this week after their organization a few days ago. Most of them have held preliminary meetings, have discussed important legislation, and appointed subcommittees to consider that legislation, but have recognized the impossibility of reporting important measures back here for the consideration of the Senate prior to the Christmas holidays. Some of them have arranged to meet during the holidays to consider these measures so that they might be brought out as early as possible after we reassemble.

I make this statement in confirmation of the attitude of the Senator from Arkansas that we would have no legislation on the calendar to dispose of if we stayed here until Christmas Day.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Kentucky for his statement. I understand that the committees in the House of Representatives are considering important measures that, with the exception of what is known as the moratorium bill, it is not expected that any important measure will be reported prior to the holiday season. I have understood that it was not expected that the moratorium would be taken up in this body, and that understanding was reached from a discussion of the subject on the floor of the Senate in which it was indicated that some consideration of the matter would be required by the Committee on Finance.

I do not think we ought to act in a childish manner about this question. I do not think any partisan advantage is to be gained by entering into an agreement and then receding from it.

The matter is not of great importance. So far as I am concerned, as I said before, if the Senate wishes, it can stay here and vote continuously on the election of a President pro tempore, and if the vote results in the selection of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] I will feel that its labors and its time have been profitably expended.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator that I did not intend to reflect upon his attitude at all. I merely wanted to call attention to the fact that two joint resolutions came over from the House to-day; and I was satisfied the Senator did not know about them, because they came over just a few moments ago, and we wanted to be sure to pass those before we took a recess.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I am very glad indeed to hear the Senator from Arkansas. His recollection and mine agree entirely. We are in very happy accord as to all the facts.

It is true that I consulted with the Speaker of the House of Representatives. It is true that at that time we agreed that, so far as we were concerned, there should be an adjournment from the 22d of December until the 4th of January. It is true that I came back here and consulted with a number of Senators and, as I stated on the floor of the Senate the other day, no fewer than two dozen Senators—and I kept a list of them—came to me to say that they intended to go home and did not want to remain in Washington over the holidays. They wanted to be with their families, or they had other reasons which justified them in absenting themselves from Washington at this particular time. It is true that I saw the Senator from Arkansas and the Speaker together, and, as far as we were able, we entered into a fast agreement to that effect.

It is true that I stood on the floor here and asserted that I had been informed that the moratorium measure would pass the House probably on Saturday, would get to the Senate probably on Monday and be referred to the Finance Committee, and, in view of the agreement to adjourn, nothing could be done with it by the committee before the time for adjournment.

It is true that at that time I served notice that, so far as I had any influence in the Senate, we would take the recess in accordance with the agreement which was made. The Senator from Idaho made a speech on the subject. Various others were of the same opinion he entertained.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana will do me the justice to say that the first time the subject was mentioned to me, before I had made any speech in regard to it, I objected to the suggestion of a holiday recess.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator did; the Senator is right about that. I talked to him about it, as I talked to a great many Senators on this side. The Senator from Idaho was one of the very few who objected to it. He stated that he did not believe we should have so long a recess. There was so much talk about the matter that I had a poll made on this side to-day. The poll showed a majority in favor of a shorter recess. I then made the statement that if the other side of the Senate took the same view of it, as a matter of course, we would be bound by the vote and take the shorter recess.

I know that nothing will be done in the Senate if we remain here during the days when those in favor of the longer recess propose that we shall be in recess. That is absolutely certain. We have no bills before us on which we can act. Committees are now at work. The Committee on Banking and Currency, which has before it some of the most important measures that will come before the Senate at this session, is now at work. The Committee on Finance will continue to work; and, as far as I am concerned, speaking from a long experience on this side, I am just as well satisfied, as I am, that I am addressing the Senate, that nothing of consequence will be accomplished if we stay here.

Therefore, like the Senator from Arkansas, I intend, so far as I have any influence here, to stand by the original agreement, and I know of no reason why we should not take the longer recess.

TAXPAYER PERIL IN MORATORIUM—ARTICLE BY SENATOR SHIPSTEAD

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, on the 8th of last October there appeared in the Minneapolis Star an article written by the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] in regard to the moratorium. I ask that the article be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SHIPSTEAD SEES TAXPAYER PERIL IN MORATORIUM—AMERICAN PEOPLE WILL HAVE TO CARRY BURDEN OF EUROPE'S FROZEN BANK CREDITS IF DEBT RECESS IS EXTENDED BEYOND ONE YEAR, MINNESOTA SENATOR DECLARES

Extension of the moratorium beyond one year, which according to the press is being considered by the President, means that the American taxpayer will have to carry the burden of frozen bank credits in Europe.

This means guaranty by the American Government of bank deposits of Europe.

If the American taxpayer is to be taxed to save frozen bank credits in Europe, why should he not be taxed to compensate depositors of busted banks in the United States?

COULDN'T PAY INTEREST

When Germany could not pay reparations nor interest on its bonds sold under the Dawes and Young plans, the moratorium was invoked. It is quite generally understood in Europe that Germany could not have paid reparations even had there been no moratorium declared. Under the moratorium the American taxpayer is practically the only taxpayer who makes a sacrifice. The British taxpayer loses a few millions, but one year's moratorium will cost the American taxpayer something like $250,000,000.

In figuring the cost of the moratorium to the taxpayer, it means that sum must be paid out of taxes this year in interest on Liberty bonds. The moratorium's postponement, if cancellation is agreed to, means that the American taxpayers pay the entire debt of about ten billion.

The moratorium means that the American Government, the only Government that could collect anything, will not collect from France and England what they owe us on money borrowed after the war. France and England get the benefit because they could pay. In my opinion, it does not change the status of Germany, because Germany couldn't pay anyhow. It is hoped that by placing the burden of payment of interest of the war debt on the American taxpayer European credits will be released to such an extent that frozen American bank credits that can not now be collected in Europe can at least be collected in part.

AT TAXPAYER'S EXPENSE

When the Dawes and Young plans were sold to the United States, the bankers of Europe knew that it was only a question of time when the Government of the United States would have to make a decision as to whom it would protect, the American taxpayer or the American banker and investor in foreign securities. That time is now here. It was here when we decided on the moratorium. A prominent European banker told me that he had no doubt that the Government of the United States would decide to protect the investor in foreign securities at the expense of the taxpayer. He further stated that he made the statement four years ago. Coming events will show us whether or not European bankers know more about our future governmental decisions than we do ourselves.

When American bankers could sell no more European bonds here, they loaned the depositors money in the form of short-term credits to European banks.

REVELATION TO WORLD

Lord Beaverbrook, the great British publisher and authority on finance, was quoted on August 19 as saying:

"We find, referring to American and British short-term credits, no man would conceive that such huge figures could have been reached. They were a revelation to the world. It is fortunate for Great Britain that New York is more heavily involved than we.

"The great question in Great Britain is whether or not the Government will pledge the national credit to restore the German situation. The same situation applies to the United States."

The suggested extension of the moratorium means merely progressive cancellation of debts of France, England, and Italy. That means money borrowed by those Governments after the war was over.

SHIPSTEAD IN 1924 SAW DAWES-PLAN KICK BACK AND SOUNDED WARNING

Senator HENRIK SHIPSTEAD, a recognized authority on finance, writing in the Minneapolis Star seven years ago to-day, predicted with almost uncanny accuracy the kick back which might be expected from the Dawes plan, which he termed "a gold brick loaded with dynamite." His prophecy, which is a tribute to his foresight and a ringing answer to critics who have asked why he was not telling us years ago that our international bankers were involving us more and more deeply in the chaos of Europe. He did that very thing.

When he was inveighing against the Dawes plan back in 1924, the Wall Street Journal took him to task severely for his attitude and charged that he had never read the plan or he would not make such statements.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 17, 1931

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our God and our Father, source of all our longings and aspirations, kindle on the altars of our hearts a sacred flame which shall burn brighter and brighter until the dawn of eternal day. Look backward, conceal our faults, and point the way. Make us like men who are on their way to work with their bright and morning faces. Enable us to make Thy law the rule of our lives, for every commandment is a benediction and a beatitude. Bless us with that peace which keeps the heart and lifts the soul. While this outward life is checkered with light and shadow, with mingled wrong and struggling right, keep us wise in that which is good and innocent in that which is evil. O God, despite it all, lead the way, lead the way. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Appropriations I offer House Joint Resolution 141, to provide additional appropriations for the Veterans' Administration for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932, and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee offers a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the following sums are appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the Veterans' Administration for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932, namely:

Adjusted-service certificate fund: For an additional amount necessary under the World War adjusted compensation act (U. S. C., title 38, secs. 591–683; Supp. V, title 38, secs. 612–682), to provide for the payment of the face value of each adjusted-service certificate in 20 years from its date or on the prior death of the veteran, and to make loans to veterans and repayments to banks, in accordance with section 507 of the act, as amended, $200,000,000, to remain available until expended.

Adjusted-service and dependent pay: For an additional amount for "Adjusted-service and dependent pay, Veterans' Bureau," and for reimbursing the adjusted-service certificate fund the amount of disbursements heretofore made therefrom and properly chargeable to the appropriation "Adjusted-service and dependent pay," $3,925,000, to remain available until expended.

Hospital and domiciliary facilities and services: For carrying out the provisions of the acts entitled "An act to authorize an appropriation to provide additional hospital, domiciliary, and outpatient dispensary facilities for persons entitled to hospitalization under the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1931 (46 Stat. 1550); "An act to establish a branch home of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers in one of the Northwest Pacific States," approved July 3, 1930 (46 Stat. 852); and "An act to provide for the establishment of a branch home of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers in one of the Southern States," approved June 21, 1930 (46 Stat. 792), the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is hereby authorized, subject to the limitations imposed by such acts, to enter into contracts and incur obligations in the full amount of the authorizations provided therein.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that unanimous consent is not necessary. This being a deficiency, it is privileged under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that this resolution is privileged. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Texas to clause 45 of Rule XI, which provides:

The following-named committee shall have leave to report at any time on the matters herein stated, namely: * * *

The Committee on Appropriations, the general appropriation bills.

The Chair does not think this is a general appropriation bill. It is merely a bill making a special appropriation for a specific proposition. Therefore the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Do I understand that this is a unanimous report from the committee?

Mr. BYRNS. I think it was practically unanimous. I know of no serious objection. The members of the committee are here and they can speak for themselves.

Mr. SNELL. I do not see the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] present.

Mr. BYRNS. There is no objection to this resolution, and it had the unanimous approval of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman from Tennessee, in a brief way, make some explanation of the principal item carried in the resolution?

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, $200,000,000 of this amount is necessary to complete the sum needed to continue the 50 per cent loans to veterans between now and June 30, 1932. Up to this time these loans have been made from what is known as the reserve fund. You will recall that under the adjusted compensation act a certain sum was set apart each year for a reserve fund, to be invested by the Secretary of the Treasury in proper securities. Up to this time there has been loaned to veterans $1,228,000,000, if my memory serves me correctly. This was paid from the reserve fund and the insurance fund. Seventy-two and seven-tenths per cent of the veterans have applied for this loan. The Director of Veterans' Affairs, General Hines, states that this estimate is based upon the anticipated application of 29 per cent of the remainder who have not up to this time applied. There is now in this fund, which is the only fund available for these loans, about $23,000,000. He states that by January 1 the payments on account of loans will amount to twenty-six million and some odd thousand dollars, and, therefore, unless this resolution is passed before the adjournment of Congress it will be necessary to delay the favorable consideration of applications for loans to be made to these veterans.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I understand the gentleman to say that of all the outstanding certificates 70 per cent have applied for loans.

Mr. BYRNS. Seventy-two and seven-tenths per cent is my recollection.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That consumed all of the reserve fund that we were building up from year to year, did it not?

Mr. BYRNS. With the exception of the $23,000,000.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Two hundred million dollars is provided in anticipation of further loans.

Mr. BYRNS. To take care of applications already on file and applications that will be made between now and June 30 next.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And that is on the estimated number of new applications that are anticipated; is that correct?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The $200,000,000 will come out of direct appropriations. That is true, is it not?

Mr. BYRNS. That is true.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. So that if additional payments are to be made on certificates there is no reserve fund to take care of them and the payments must be made out of direct appropriations?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman inform the House as to what the estimate of the Director of the Veterans' Bureau is as to the total amount that will be required for payments under the 50 per cent law?

Mr. BYRNS. One billion seven hundred and ten million dollars.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman also advise the House as to how much we have appropriated in addition to the $700,000,000 that was in the sinking fund?

Mr. BYRNS. I just stated to the House that up to date there has been loaned $1,228,000,000. This sum will be added to that, and then there will be carried, if the estimate of the director is concurred in, an additional sum of $150,000,000 in the regular bill for the next fiscal year. How much more will be needed, of course, no one can say.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield a moment there?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. There has doubtless come to the attention of other Members, as it has to me, that certain dependency claims have been allowed, but the Veterans' Bureau advises that there is no fund from which to pay such claims. Is it contemplated that this measure shall also provide ample funds for the payment of those claims?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes; that is represented by the item of $3,925,000 for adjusted-service and dependent pay.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is a different account.

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Can the gentleman tell us the total amount that has been paid up to date under the cash bonus law?

Mr. BYRNS. I am sorry I have not that at hand.

Mr. PATMAN. $1,260,000,000. That is in the President's message.

Mr. BYRNS. There has been the impression throughout the country that the passage of this 50 per cent loan law, if I may call it that, has either created or contributed to the deficit. There is nothing to that statement because up to this time the payments have been made out of the reserve fund.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Except the $200,000,000 now to be appropriated.

Mr. BYRNS. Yes; as the gentleman from New York suggests, this $200,000,000 is the first direct appropriation that has been made for that purpose.

Mr. PATTERSON. If the gentleman will yield, that is the question I intended to ask. Irrespective of all this talk about the deficit on account of the soldiers' adjusted-service certificate, this $200,000,000 is the first deficit appropriation really passed on that account. And this amount of $1,260,000,000 also includes death claims paid to dependents of soldiers as well as the loans themselves.

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

The appropriation of $3,925,000, which is carried in this joint resolution, represents the amount that will be necessary to take care of the adjusted-service and dependent-pay item, as has been stated by my colleague from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER].

There is another provision in this resolution which authorizes the director to enter into contracts for hospitals under an authorization which now amounts to a balance of about $17,000,000. This is under the authorization law which carried $25,000,000 and which was passed at the last session. No money is required at this time, but the director states that unless this authority is given to enter into these contracts there will be, of course, quite a delay in beginning the construction of these hospitals which are needed in various sections of the country.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does that carry with it a commitment of appropriations for the contracts which he will enter into?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes; within the limitations of the authorization.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Which is $25,000,000.

Mr. BYRNS. $25,000,000.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And the estimated amount is $17,000,000?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. KETCHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield.

Mr. KETCHAM. Will the gentleman be kind enough to repeat, for emphasis, and utterly apart from any other question so that it may be seen clearly by everyone, the statement he made a moment ago with reference to the fact that the amount of money that has thus far been paid on the adjusted-service certificates can in no sense be considered a part of the deficit about which we see so much in the papers throughout the country?

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman has already emphasized it more strongly than I could.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have two or three cases in my files, and I understand some of my colleagues have similar cases covering this proposition. A number of ex-service men, for one reason or another, waited a number of years before filing their claim for the $60 bonus to which they were entitled upon their discharge, and the sum that was formerly appropriated for that purpose has been used up. Does this particular bill contain any provision for the payment of claims of that nature?

Mr. BYRNS. It does. The item of $3,925,000 includes such claims.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

EMPLOYMENT SERVICE, DEPARTMENT OF LABOR

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Appropriations, I offer the following joint resolution, making an additional appropriation for the Employment Service, Department of Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee offers a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the sum of $120,000 is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932, for the Employment Service, Department of Labor, including the same objects and purposes specified under this head in the act making appropriations for the Department of Labor for the fiscal year 1932: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the establishment or maintenance of any employment office for which suitable space is not furnished free of rent by State, county, or local authority, or by individuals or organizations.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman give me time to offer an amendment?

Mr. BYRNS. Certainly; if we get consent for consideration of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, if I may make a brief statement, the estimate submitted for this particular purpose was $168,000. The Secretary of Labor stated that it was proposed under this appropriation to establish 54 additional employment offices in various parts of the country. He also stated that he was unable at the time the hearing was held to say just where these offices would be located.

This estimate contemplated the employment of three persons in each of the 54 offices. He stated their salaries would be $2,000 for the manager, $1,800 for the assistant manager, and $1,440 for a clerk-stenographer. Twelve thousand dollars was for rent.

He said that the applications from cities over the country for the establishment of these offices were sufficient to almost overwhelm him. Your committee felt that if these cities and towns are so desirous of this additional aid in looking after the unemployed in their section, they could certainly afford to furnish quarters for the necessary employees.

So the committee has cut out the $12,000 estimated for rent and has put in a provision requiring that offices shall not be established under this appropriation in any part of the country unless quarters are provided.

The estimate was based on six months. Your committee felt that it would be impossible for this resolution to be passed at this time and for the Secretary of Labor to establish these offices by January 1. It was felt an appropriation based on five and a half months would be adequate.

The committee further felt that there was really no necessity for three employees in each office. In 60 of the 96 that have been established, for which $883,000 was appropriated, they have only two employees.

The appropriation recommended will enable the Labor Department to establish the 54 offices as planned with two persons in one-half of the offices. The Secretary can use his judgment as to whether the remaining offices shall have three persons. The committee doubts the necessity but did not wish to take away from him all discretion in a matter of this great importance.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. What was the information that came to the committee on the effect of the offices already set up?

Mr. BYRNS. The Secretary stated that nearly 800,000 persons had been employed as a result of the work of the department under the appropriation made by Congress. He further stated that 600,000 had been placed in cooperation with the States that have similar offices, making in all some 1,400,000.

Mr. SNELL. In the mind of the committee these have produced good results?

Mr. BYRNS. I think it has been of considerable benefit. I question whether it is possible to say exactly to what extent it has relieved unemployment or that any of this number would not have been employed if the appropriation had not been made. I can see that if the managers are active, if they get out on the street and do not sit in their offices in swivel chairs, but get in direct contact with the employers, it will do a great deal of good.

Mr. SNELL. This is another step to do something toward helping unemployment?

Mr. BYRNS. That is the idea, to be helpful, if we can.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Now, will the gentleman yield to me to offer an amendment?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert at the end of the resolution the following:
"Provided further, That after January 1, 1932, no salary shall be paid in any field employment office under the Employment Service at a rate in excess of $2,000 per annum.'"

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. BYRNS. I yield to the gentleman three minutes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to something parallel and in point. In the State of New York we have an employment agency law which requires that the employment agent shall return the fee if employment is not found. That law has been on the statute books for some time, and only a few days ago the United States Court for the Southern District of New York, again interfering in matters in which it has no business, said that the State law was unconstitutional. I refer to the case of National Employment Exchange against Commissioner of Licenses of the City of New York, in the District Court of the Southern District of New York.

You are all familiar with the employment agency, and the only way you can protect the helpless who go to these agencies is to provide for a return of the fee if employment is not found.

A so-called philanthropic employment agency, with a long list of directors and sponsors, most distinguished citizens, if you please, unintentionally on the part of these gentlemen, I am sure, but viciously on the part of some one, simply did the dirty work for a lot of mean, contemptible, and unscrupulous private employment agencies which thrive on the exploitation of needy and poor unemployed people. Without the protection of our State law the applicants are at the mercy of these private agencies. If the United States court is going to interfere in such necessary protective State laws, it is a good thing that we can at least provide something here—where the unemployed may appeal to a free employment service. We have a city employment service in New York City, as I suppose other cities have, but I protest now against the decision of the United States court defeating beneficial State law where no real constitutional question was involved. What is wrong, morally or legally, with a State law which requires the return of a fee if the employment agency renders no service?

We must have Federal and State employment agencies to drive these unfair, exploiting, private agencies out of business.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. I do not understand that there is any fee in connection with this service.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No. I am pointing out what happened in the State of New York.

Mr. BYRNS. As the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] says, the chief advantage of this particular appropriation is the fact that it will cut out these employment offices which in many instances have been robbing applicants for employment.

I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BOYLAN].

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, I favor this appropriation. I am in favor of anything that will help relieve the great wave of unemployment that has swept over our country, but at this time I would like to direct the attention of the House to the fact that at the last session of Congress we passed a series of bills introduced by the junior Senator from New York, Senator WAGNER. One of those bills provided for setting up employment offices throughout the country. After deliberation and consideration it was vetoed by the President. A great storm of public criticism swept upon him for this action. To counteract this criticism the Secretary of Labor established offices throughout the country to endeavor to accomplish what was purposed to be accomplished by the passage of the bills introduced by the junior Senator from the State of New York. If I recall correctly, the Secretary stated that there was no need for such legislation, and perhaps he was instrumental in advising the President to veto the Wagner bill. On the other hand, he started out himself to set up offices to accomplish the very purpose sought to be accomplished by the bill passed in the last Congress. This has cost to date about $1,000,000. I am in favor of this appropriation, however, but I want the RECORD to show the action taken by the Secretary of Labor after he advised the President to veto the Wagner bill.

Mr. BYRNS. May I say this in connection with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER]. The committee considered the question of the limitation of salaries. I would be perfectly willing to agree to an amendment of that kind offered with reference to this appropriation. There are 96 offices which have been already created. There are State directors in every State, I assume, and their salaries are more than $2,000, certainly in some States. I feel that possibly it would not be wise, without further consideration, to undertake to limit the salaries in the amount named in the appropriation, with reference to the 96 offices already established.

Mr. ARENTZ. I think the gentleman is correct in that, and I agree with him.

Mr. BYRNS. I hope the gentleman will limit it to the present appropriation.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Would the gentleman be willing to except from the amendment, then, the State directors?

Mr. BYRNS. I would not object so much to that, unless it should interfere with the services in some of these larger cities, like New York.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Then I move to amend by adding the words "Provided further, That this limitation shall not apply to the salary of any State director."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of the amendment the words "Provided further, That this limitation shall not apply to the salary of any State director."

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the amendment, in order to ask the gentleman from Alabama the reason for fixing the figure at $2,000.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. For the reason that the Secretary stated to the committee that in the employment of men to manage the 54 offices which he contemplates establishing with this additional appropriation he would not fix any salary in excess of $2,000. There are some offices now being maintained where the duties are exactly the same, yet the salaries are in excess of $2,000, and it was my thought that the compensation should at least be uniform.

Mr. LEAVITT. My reason for opposing this amendment is this: During the war I organized and directed 13 such employment offices in the State of Montana. A number of them were full-time offices. Some of them were cooperative offices. During the period of the war the employment service which I had the honor to direct in that State did a work in its value beyond the mere placing of men. It was the Government of the United States operating upon the ground for the benefit of a man out of a job to help him get the one thing he needed to make a living. Before that he saw the Government of the United States operating for the protection of the business men, for the protection of all sorts of other classes of people, but so far as he was concerned he was at the mercy of the private employment agency, that, as has well been stated here to-day, often exploited him. The United States Employment Service was built up during the war, and let me say here that one of the greatest mistakes the Government of the United States has ever made was when it contracted that service and made it less in extent. It should have been maintained and carried on so that we would not be now in the position of trying to reestablish its efficiency in time of emergency. In addition to merely placing these men it showed them their Government operating to help them solve their problems, and it had a direct and beneficial effect upon them. You are now asking men to take charge of offices with such a service to perform at a salary which, in my judgment, is going to be too low in many of the larger cities, or in cities of any reasonable size, to enable us to carry out the full purpose of the establishment of employment offices.

While on my feet let me say this with regard to the veto of the Wagner bill. I voted for the Wagner bill and was very much in favor of it. The reasons for the veto, however, should be put into the RECORD along with the criticism of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BOYLAN]. It was vetoed because it was shown, according to the statement of the President, that it would abolish the existing service, but that certain cooperation was required under that bill from the States before the new law could operate, and that the State legislatures of many States would not be in session in time to meet the requirement and take care of this emergency. The present employment service was already in effect and had authorization of law behind it for immediate expansion.

That was the only reason, as I recall, that was given. I think that should go in the RECORD, along with the criticism.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I do not think the statement made by the gentleman from Montana [Mr. LEAVITT] is very relevant to the pending amendment. This amendment was prepared by me because I was familiar with the appropriation for such purposes carried for years for the Department of Labor, and which I think has been very wisely administered. That appropriation was for $385,000, and the Labor Department reported to our committee that with the appropriation of $385,000 in the gentleman's State and other States they had been able to find seasonal employment for approximately 1,600,000 men. The field agents under that appropriation were paid reasonable salaries; few, if any, salaries exceeded $2,000. The agent in Doctor SUMMERS'S home city of Yakima, Wash., was paid only $1,500.

Mr. LEAVITT. He is worth a great deal more.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Grant that he is a very fine man, he is satisfied. So when the Secretary of Labor came before the committee and asked for an additional $168,000, so that he might establish more offices, he was asked, "How much will you fix as the salary for the man in charge of the office?" He said, "Under no circumstances will I fix it in excess of $2,000."

This amendment simply limits it to what the Secretary himself said would be required at offices he plans to establish under the appropriation you are now considering. Why should a different pay schedule apply to those employed under the appropriation carried in the regular appropriation bill for the present fiscal year?

Mr. LEAVITT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. LEAVITT. Is it not true, however, that in connection with this bill, unless I misunderstand it, we are undertaking to establish a number of new employment offices, and that necessarily to meet their purposes they must be established in cities of considerable size, so that they will not only be State directors who are required but often local directors of great importance?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. If the gentleman had been listening to the chairman of the committee, he would have heard him say in reply to the question, "What is the limit of salaries the Secretary stated he would fix under this appropriation of $168,000"——

Mr. LEAVITT. I heard that statement.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The Secretary stated the highest salary would be $2,000, the next $1,800, and the next $1,400.

Mr. LEAVITT. That is only for this emergency?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes. This amendment seeks to limit the amount to $2,000.

Mr. LEAVITT. When we carry the Wagner bill into effect we are going to require a quality of men that can not always be secured for $2,000 a year. Why establish a dangerous precedent by law, fixing the figure now so low that it will then be insufficient and will be used in the future as a precedent? We have the statement of the Secretary that he will not now employ anybody at more than $2,000, so we need no such law. I do not like to see any such precedent established.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Is it not true that the 96 offices which we now have are all in the main places of the country? These 54 new offices are to be in the smaller points, and it was brought to our attention that it was not necessary to pay high salaries for these additional offices that would go in the more unimportant places. The 96 offices now are in the main cities.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

THE AMERICAN TAXPAYERS' LEAGUE

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to be permitted to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, the country has been advised that there will be a revision of the tax law during the present session of Congress. In all likelihood the Committee on Ways and Means will proceed, within a very few days, to consider a new tax bill. I believe it is necessary that the word should go out that any citizen or group of citizens who have any suggestions to make will be heard, but at the same time I believe the country should be warned against certain exploiters who are attempting to collect money under the promise that they can influence tax legislation. [Applause.]

I want to refer particularly, and without any reservation, to one J. A. Arnold, who styled himself "The American Taxpayers' League."

The activities of this gentleman were looked into and the Members of this House can find all details in the hearings of the Senate lobby investigation—Senate Resolution 20, Seventy-first Congress, first session—in parts 2 and 3 of the printed hearings. For the moment it will suffice to read just a part of the report of the Senate committee:

> Among the organizations into whose activities your committee inquired were the Southern Tariff Association, the American Taxpayers' League, the National Council of State Legislators, and kindred reputed organizations, all aliases, under which one J. A. Arnold operates, ostensibly to influence congressional legislation, but, in fact, for the purpose of making a living for himself and a small group associated with him.
> The American Taxpayers' League has neither constitution, by-laws, nor membership except contributors. Under its name Arnold collected for the years ended August 31, 1927, 1928, and 1929, the sums of $217,000, $246,000, $240,000, and $156,000, making a total for the four years of $860,000.

Now, it is well that the American people should know, and business men particularly, that if they are solicited for funds by this group or by Mr. Arnold it is simply a waste of money. Only recently Mr. Arnold has established connections with the National Broadcasting Co., and they have invited very distinguished gentlemen to appear under their auspices. There is no criticism of the distinguished citizens who have made speeches on the subjects in which they are interested, but I want to warn those distinguished gentlemen that their names may be exploited by these collectors of contributions, and their good and respected names used to give respectability to this discredited group and this discredited gentleman, Mr. Arnold.

Let me point out to the broadcasting companies that they, in all likelihood, will be taxed, and properly so, and it is hardly fair to use the public domain to engender propaganda against an inevitable tax on radio, which must sooner or later be imposed by Congress.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Certainly.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Does not the gentleman think that every one of these organized groups, which are now parading and advertising their influence and seeking to impose their narrowness and constricted views upon the people of the United States, should be legislated out of the Capital?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Absolutely; but in the meantime let the word go out that this American Taxpayers' League and Mr. Arnold are discredited, and let everybody be on their guard when they are asked for contributions.

Mr. BURTNESS. Will the gentleman yield.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. BURTNESS. Can the gentleman tell us what representations he now makes with reference to the type of taxes he is going to save to the contributors?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I suppose he is guaranteeing prospective contributors against the inheritance tax, against the gift tax, and against a tax on radio. Taxes are always unpleasant, and it is the easiest thing in the world to make an appeal for contributions and say, "We have certain connections and we are going to fix you up. So contribute to us." I am sure the House will agree with me that there is no need of any citizen or business to pay money to these discredited lobbyists. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—MUSCLE SHOALS

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

To the Congress of the United States:

In my message to the Senate on March 3 last, returning without my approval Senate Joint Resolution No. 49, I suggested that as the solution of the Muscle Shoals problem was a matter of major interest to the States of Tennessee and Alabama, these States should set up a commission of their own representatives to cooperate with a like commission appointed by me to consider the disposition of the Muscle Shoals project.

On March 20, 1931, the Legislature of the State of Tennessee passed the accompanying resolution, which was approved by the governor on March 23, 1931. Under this resolution Mr. Mercer Reynolds, Mr. Vance J. Alexander, and Mr. W. A. Caldwell were appointed members of the commission. As Mr. Alexander and Mr. Caldwell were unable to serve, the governor subsequently appointed Mr. J. F. Porter and Mr. R. L. Moore to fill the vacancies. On June 30, 1931, the Assembly of Alabama passed the accompanying resolution, which was approved by the governor on June 30, 1931, and under it Mr. S. F. Hobbs, Mr. Will Howard Smith, and Mr. W. F. McFarland were appointed members of the commission. On July 14, 1931, I appointed Col. Harley B. Ferguson, Corps of Engineers, United States Army; Col. Joseph I. McMullen, office of the Judge Advocate General, United States Army; and Mr. Edward A. O'Neal, president of the American Farm Bureau Federation, as members of the commission.

Hearings were held, and after long consideration of the subject the commission rendered to me a unanimous report, which I now transmit for the consideration of the Congress. In addition, the commission has prepared a brochure showing the evidence on which its recommendations are based. This I also transmit for the information of the Congress.

HERBERT HOOVER.

QUOTATION FROM LINCOLN QUESTIONED

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD. By way of explanation of the request I refer to a paragraph in a speech made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] two days ago, in which he quoted from Abraham Lincoln. The quotation in question was so remote from any subject matter of interest at that time that I questioned the authenticity of it. I asked the reference bureau to look up the speeches of Mr. Lincoln and see whether they could find that quotation in any speech. I have a letter from the director of the Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress saying in effect that there is no record of any such speech, and also inclosing a photostat copy of a paragraph from the New York Tribune of October 3, 1896, in which Mr. Nicolay, the biographer of Lincoln, declared the quotation in question was an unblushing forgery. For the sake of the RECORD, I ask unanimous consent that this letter from the director of the Legislative Reference Service and the photostat copy of the Tribune clipping in question may be extended in the RECORD in connection with my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS,
LEGISLATIVE REFERENCE SERVICE,
Washington, December 17, 1931.

Hon. MORTON D. HULL,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The quotation from Lincoln printed on page 573, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, December 15, 1931, has been referred to us several times but no one has ever been able to find it in any edition of Lincoln's works. I inclose a photostat of a brief article which appeared in the New York Tribune for Saturday, October 3, 1896, page 1, column 4. It seems to settle the question.

William E. Barton, in his Life of Lincoln, volume 2, page 367, has the following to say about this quotation:

"A consideration of the attitude of Abraham Lincoln toward labor requires us to remember, first of all, that he lived and died before the present-day industrial system had come into existence. Several people who have wanted to quote him on labor have forgotten this, and have attributed to Lincoln statements which can not be found in his published works and which are the outgrowth of conditions which came into being after he was dead. For instance, a widely quoted statement concerning the threatened rise of great corporations is known to have originated with another man in 1873; but it is quoted as from the pen of Lincoln."

Very respectfully,

H. H. B. MEYER,
Director Legislative Reference Service.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 3, 1896—LINCOLN NEVER SAID IT—A POPOCRATIC CAMPAIGN QUOTATION DENOUNCED AS A BALD FORGERY

CHICAGO, October 2.—Perry S. Heath of the Republican National Committee to-day received from John G. Nicolay, who was one of President Lincoln's private secretaries, a letter in which he declares "spurious" an alleged quotation from Lincoln now in general circulation as a Democratic campaign document. The quotation thus condemned is as follows:

"Mr. Lincoln said: 'As a result of the war, corporations have been enthroned and an era of corruption in high places will follow, and the money power of the country will endeavor to prolong its reign by working upon the prejudices of the people, until all wealth is aggregated in a few hands, and the Republic is destroyed. I feel at this moment more anxiety for the safety of my country than ever before; even in the midst of war. God grant that my suspicions may prove groundless.'"

Mr. Nicolay continues:

"This alleged quotation from Mr. Lincoln is a bald, unblushing forgery. The great President never said it or wrote it, and never said or wrote anything that by the utmost license could be distorted to resemble it."

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a radio speech by my colleague, Congressman KNUTSON, delivered night before last over WJSV.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me by the House to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I desire to insert a radio address delivered last evening by my colleague, Hon. HAROLD KNUTSON, of Minnesota, over station WJSV, on the question of Philippine independence.

The address is as follows:

It is no exaggeration to say that rarely, if ever before, has the world witnessed in any age or race or people a parallel for the sudden and apparently complete collapse that seems to have overtaken the movement for absolute independence in the Philippines. For more than 30 years their native press in flaming headlines, and their accredited leaders in raucous tones, have been denouncing American occupation. They have made the welkin ring with pleas for freedom and independence, while we as a nation have been held up to the scorn and contumely of mankind.

We have been painted as the fine flower of an imperialism which professes the blessings of a democracy at home but does not hesitate to clamp the iron heel of despotism upon the necks of a distant, prostrate, and helpless people. The hatreds and jealousies of the Old World have been subtly and steadily fanned, not only by the Filipino leaders but by their drawing-room adherents in this country, who taunt us for a seeming inconsistency in enforcing the Monroe doctrine in the New World while pursuing a rôle of conquest and exploitation in the Orient.

And now when we announce our readiness to withdraw from a place where we have been proclaimed unwelcome, to stand aside and allow the Filipino people to step full panoplied and without the cost of either blood or treasure into a place among the nations of the earth, these self-same critics who have been denouncing us as despoilers reject that offer and begin to haggle, not on the lofty points of patriotism but in sordid terms of trade. Let those critics who are so prone to criticize America for her policy toward the islands contrast this picture with that of the Mahatma Gandhi, now traveling back from London to India in disappointment and sorrow because he has been unable to wheedle from the British the very gift we are now asking the Philippine people to accept.

Ever since we have held these islands it has been our practice to look upon our presence there more or less in the light of a temporary arrangement; the status of their people and the trade relations we should maintain with them are abstract questions in political science to be studied at leisure, shifted from time to time as exigencies might require, but ultimately to be settled by granting them full and complete independence. But, while this dilettant idea has prevailed with respect to administrative problems, economic forces have been intensely active in the Philippines. Especially has this been true of corporations. Manned by staffs of highly skilled experts and adequately supplied with funds, American and foreign corporations have been exploiting alike the cheap labor and almost inexhaustible supplies of free raw materials to be found in those islands. These products are then admitted on terms of equality to our home markets to compete with our own farmers and laborers.

This situation has been growing steadily worse with each succeeding year. The strides with which Philippine products have been displacing the output of our own farms and factories is told in terms that are exact and are at the same time shown increasingly alarming by the official records at our ports of entry. Two years ago, on the eve of the last Congress, when the Philippine question gave every promise of again entering upon a long period of academic discussion, I decided to cut the Gordian knot by introducing a bill providing for their early independence, not alone because of an altruistic interest in the Philippines but rather in the interest of the American farmer.

In explanation of that measure I acknowledged America's duty toward the Philippines and our solemn pledge to the Filipino people, but at the same time I placed the best interests of America first. I pointed out that:

We have been playing the good Samaritan to the less fortunate of other lands since the Republic was founded. American blood has been shed in the Philippines, Cuba, Haiti, Santo Domingo, Nicaragua, not to mention France and Belgium; and for what? To establish peace and security for peoples in no way related to us. We have relieved distress where there was hunger and established orderly government where there was anarchy. Surely, if we were to retire from the Philippines at this time, we could not be justly accused of selfishness with that fine record of unselfish disinterestedness behind us.

Personally, I believe the Filipinos to be ready for the independence promised them by the martyred McKinley and reiterated in nearly every political platform adopted by the two major parties since 1900. They now have a stable government, elected by the suffrages of the Filipino people and supported by them; they have demonstrated their ability to maintain that government, and we have no reason to doubt their capacity for fulfilling any international obligations which they may assume. What more can we reasonably expect of any people who may aspire to political freedom and complete self-rule?

I have seen no reason to alter the opinion then expressed, although many Filipino leaders since that time have themselves shifted their position.

While various American interests, notably among them the domestic sugar producers, are opposed to admitting unlimited quantities of Philippine products to our home markets on terms of equality with our own, I am primarily concerned with protecting the American dairy interests from this unequal and unfair competition. The deplorable condition of the American dairy farmer has not changed for the better since I discussed this question on the floor of the House on December 14, 1929. At that time I pointed out that we were within 2 per cent of the saturation point in the production of dairy products in the United States. There was then 140,000,000 pounds of butter in cold storage, an increase of 33,000,000 pounds over the preceding year. In addition there was in storage 300,000,000 pounds of condensed and evaported milk, 23,000,000 pounds of dried milk, and 78,000,000 pounds of cheese, making a total of 540,000,000 pounds of surplus dairy products in storage at that time. Conditions are relatively worse to-day than they were then, as was disclosed by the recent hearings on the Farm Board before the Senate Committee on Agriculture. In its second annual report just published the Farm Board points out that during the past year the butter producers have been compelled to reduce their marketing margins and only through reduced retail prices and the elimination of every possible distributing cost has consumption been maintained.

The board frankly adds, however, that, and I quote—

"Reduced consumer-purchasing power, reduced fluid-milk consumption * * * complicated the problems of the dairy cooperatives during the past year."

While our own farmers were unable to pay taxes, reduce mortgages and even to purchase for their families the necessaries, much less the comforts of life, let us see how fared their competitors in the Philippines who are rapidly crowding the American dairy farmer out of the home market. As against the American dairy cow that has to be housed, fed, and cared for every day at great expense, we have introduced as a competitor the coconut cow. In his last report, upon which the ink is scarcely dry, the Chief of the Bureau of Insular Affairs announces that on one plantation in the Philippines during the past year 50,000 coconut trees were planted and that during the past 15 years Filipino farmers have planted more than 50,000,000 coconut trees. There are now under agricultural development over 9,284,856 acres, an area more than 65 per cent greater than was in cultivation 20 years ago. Nor are these figures surprising when it is recalled that we furnish a free market for 72 per cent of their exports, valued at $183,525,090 while in return they absorb but 1.6 per cent of our own exports. If anyone entertains any doubt as to the outcome of the contest between the Philippine coconut forests on the one hand and the American farms that produce butterfats, lard, and cottonseed oil on the other, all that is necessary to resolve that doubt is to see how the imports of copra from the Philippines have been growing since our manufacturers of soaps, paints, condiments, and food preparations settled upon the Philippine product as a cheaper and equally satisfactory substitute for the products of our own farms.

As I pointed out when I introduced my bill to give independence to these islands, we are importing from them "over 700,000,000 pounds of vegetable oil annually. These huge importations go into the manufacture of butter substitutes, and they enter into direct competition with the various interests of the country, with the swine raisers, because they compete with animal fats, also with the cotton grower and his cottonseed oil, so that the South is equally interested with us of the North in seeing that this unfair competition from the Orient is stopped."

Perhaps no higher authority could be quoted on this question than the head of that nationally known institution, the Land O'Lakes Creameries (Inc.). At the time I introduced the Philippine independence bill two years ago, Mr. John Brandt, the president of that institution, wrote me a letter, in the course of which he said:

"I am very much interested in the bill you recently introduced. * * * One of the greatest causes of dairy overproduction in the United States is the import of foreign oils that are taking the place of products we might well raise on our own farms.

"You will have the united support from the dairy industry and the cooperative organizations for the bill you have introduced. If independence of the Philippines can not be accomplished, we are in hopes that all of our Representatives will support a higher duty on vegetable oils as the exclusion of these products will be of greater assistance to the agricultural industry."

Mr. Brandt states the position of the dairy interests fully and completely.

Inasmuch as the plight of the cotton farmer is the same as that of the dairyman of my own State, I have felt that it was entirely proper to point out that the Southern States have a common interest with those of the North and West in seeing that proper steps are taken to protect our farmers against this rising flood of copra and vegetable oils that are coming in duty free from the Philippines and other far-eastern islands.

I do not have the time to enter into the details of the legislation, but I do want to go on record as saying emphatically that I am opposed to any injustice or to any discrimination that will unfairly operate against the Filipino people. I do insist, however, that as a matter of protection to the American farmer the imports from the Philippines entering into competition with American agriculture should be placed on exactly the same footing as the imports from Argentina, Canada, Cuba, or any other country seeking to invade the American market and to displace the products of the American farm.

As to their sugar and other products which enter our markets in competition with produce made from rival American investments in other outlying countries I have not the time to speak on this occasion. What I am mainly interested in is to save our small American farmers who live in our own country and are attempting to bring up their families according to the standards of American living from the unequal and deadening competition of the Orient.

The Philippine independence movement in this country is predicated largely upon economic grounds. Should it be found inexpedient to grant immediate independence, then we should gradually put into effect the tariff rates on importations from the islands that are in effect on importations from all foreign countries. If that be done, we can not very well refuse the pleas of the Filipino people that they be given 5 or 10 years in which to set up such machinery as may be necessary to the conduct of a free and independent government. Such a program would not, I believe, prove objectionable to the best interests of agricultural America, for the primary purpose of our aims would then be realized. In closing, let me venture the conviction that when we withdraw from the Philippines we should do so lock, stock, and barrel, and without entering into any commitments as to their future.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, for the information of the Members, I desire to say that the hearings on the moratorium were closed at 12 o'clock to-day, and the committee is now considering the resolution. They expect to bring it up to-morrow, and they are going to try to get a vote on it by Saturday night. It is doubtful whether they can do that, and if they do not get a vote by Saturday night it will be considered Monday and Tuesday. I make that statement because I have heretofore stated that nothing controversial will be taken up Monday or Tuesday, unless it is that. If we do not get a vote by Saturday night, the consideration of the moratorium will be continued during Monday and Tuesday. After we do get a vote on the moratorium there will be nothing controversial before the holidays.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Does not the gentleman think it would be a good idea to hold the House in late session to-morrow night and Saturday night for the purpose of having a vote on the moratorium this week?

Mr. RAINEY. I think that would be all right, and I would be very glad to see that done.

Mr. SNELL. We have had two weeks of discussion in connection with this proposition, and it seems to me we ought to be able to finish it at least by Saturday night.

Mr. RAINEY. I would be glad to accomplish that if it is possible to do so.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. Has there been any discussion in the committee as to how much time will be given to the consideration of the moratorium bill or resolution?

Mr. RAINEY. No; there has been no discussion, except the committee desires to limit it as much as they possibly can, yet giving an opportunity to Members who ought to be heard and desire to be heard on the proposition.

Mr. HASTINGS. I know there has been a good deal of discussion in the House for the last few days about this subject, but I would like to have 10 or 15 minutes myself when the bill comes up for consideration.

Mr. RAINEY. In order to obtain that time the gentleman will have to see the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER], the chairman of the committee.

Mr. HASTINGS. I wanted to be assured that there would be some time given for consideration. Of course, I intended to apply to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. RAINEY. There will be time given.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask leave of absence for my colleague [Mr. HALL of Illinois] on account of illness. He will probably be detained two or three days on account of his condition.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the leave of absence will be granted.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to make this suggestion to gentlemen who in the future desire to provide leaves of absence for their colleagues. There is provided at the Sergeant at Arms desk, on the Speaker's right, blanks for just such purposes. The Chair would suggest that Members avail themselves of that means of securing leaves of absence. These blanks, when filled out and given to the Clerk, will be laid before the House prior to adjournment for the approval of the House. The Chair thinks that by this means much of the time of the House will be saved.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I will conform to that practice in the future.

ESTATE TAX FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 5822) to provide a tax on the transfers of estates of decedents.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 5822), with Mr. MCMILLAN in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. The value of the net estate subject to the tax herein provided shall be determined by deducting from the value of the gross estate the following exemptions:

(1) The value of all property transferred to or for the use of the United States, to any State or Territory or to any political subdivision thereof, to the District of Columbia, to any public institution to be used strictly for public purposes, or to any corporation organized under the laws of the District of Columbia solely for religious, charitable, or educational purposes: Provided, That the property transferred is to be used exclusively for one or more of such purposes and all property transferred to banks or trust companies as trustees and trusts used exclusively for public, religious, charitable, or educational purposes: Provided, further, That no deduction shall be allowed on account of property transferred to any such corporation or trust, if any officer, member, shareholder, or employee thereof shall receive or may be lawfully entitled to receive any pecuniary profit from the operation thereof, except reasonable compensation for services in effecting one or more of such purposes or as proper beneficiaries of a strictly charitable purpose, or if the organization of any such association, or trust, for any of the foregoing or above purposes be a guise or a pretense for indirectly making for it, or for any of its officers, members, shareholders, or employees, any other pecuniary profit, or if it be not in good faith organized and conducted for one or more of such purposes.

(2) Debts of the decedent which constitute lawful claims against his estate.

(3) Taxes on real property within the District of Columbia which were a lien at the date of death, also taxes on personal property of the decedent which constituted a personal obligation during his lifetime or were a lien at the time of death.

(4) Death taxes paid or payable to other jurisdictions on intangible personal property and United States estate taxes, also special assessment taxes which at the time of the decedent's death were a lien on real property located within the District of Columbia.

(5) Funeral expenses and an amount not in excess of $500 actually expended or to be expended for a memorial, also commissions of executors, administrators, or trustees actually allowed or paid, but where a bequest or devise is made in lieu of commission, deductions shall be allowed for only so much as would have been allowed and paid in the absence of the devise or bequest. There shall also be deducted the expenses of the administration, including reasonable attorney's fees.

(6) In the case of the estate of a nonresident only such portion of the aforesaid deductions shall be allowed as is properly chargeable against the property included in the gross estate, and the exemptions shall be apportioned in the ratio that the value of the property included in the gross estate bears to the value of all of the property that would have been included in the gross estate if the decedent had been a resident of the District of Columbia.

(7) No deduction from the value of the property included in the gross estate shall be allowed on account of any claim against the estate arising from a contract made by the decedent and payable by its terms at or after death, unless such claim is supported, in whole or in part, by a valuable consideration, in which event so much thereof as is the equivalent in money value of the money value of the consideration received by the decedent shall be allowed as a deduction, but the remaining portion shall not be: Provided, however, That any claim created by an antenuptial agreement and made payable by will shall be allowed as a deduction.

(8) There shall also be deducted from the gross estate property having a clear market value of $20,000 transferred to the widow of the decedent, property having a clear market value of $10,000 transferred to the husband of the decedent, property having a clear market value of $5,000 transferred to a brother or sister of the decedent, property having a clear market value of $2,000 transferred to any lineal ancestor of the decedent, legally adopted child, stepchild, any child to whom the decedent for not less than 10 years prior to death stood in the mutually acknowledged relationship of parent: Provided, That such relationship began at or before the child's fifteenth birthday and was continuous for at least 10 years thereafter, and the lineal descendant of an adopted child, stepchild, or mutually acknowledged child. In case no property passes to any beneficiaries enumerated in this section, or, if the aggregate of the value of the property passing to such beneficiaries is less than $1,000 there shall be exempted property having a value of $1,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment: Line 11, page 7, insert after the word "decedent" the following: "Any child born in lawful wedlock."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. STAFFORD: Line 11, page 7, after the word "decedent," insert "any child born in lawful wedlock."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, a close reading of the provision shows that no provision has been made for any child born in lawful wedlock. Provision is made for deductions to any legally adopted child or any child of a morganatic marriage; provision is also made for deductions to the widow, the husband, brother, sister, or parents. Certainly there should be some provision made for a child born in lawful wedlock.

As I read this provision, I take it that it applies to those instances where the decedent has bequeathed or devised property to these respective classes, and where they have then they shall be entitled to a deduction of the various amounts as here stated. So the purpose of my amendment is to include children as well as other designated relatives.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, after talking with the chairman of the special committee, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES], we will accept the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. The tax hereby imposed upon the value of the net estate shall be at the following rates:

(1) Not in excess of $50,000, 1 per cent.
(2) Over $50,000 and not exceeding $100,000, 2 per cent.
(3) Over $100,000 and not exceeding $200,000, 3 per cent.
(4) Over $200,000 and not exceeding $300,000, 4 per cent.
(5) Over $300,000 and not exceeding $500,000, 5 per cent.
(6) Over $500,000 and not exceeding $750,000, 6 per cent.
(7) Over $750,000 and not exceeding $1,250,000, 7 per cent.
(8) Over $1,250,000 and not exceeding $2,000,000, 8 per cent.
(9) Over $2,000,000 and not exceeding $5,000,000, 10 per cent.
(10) On all net estates having a value in excess of $5,000,000 the tax imposed shall be at the rate of 15 per cent.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I do so for the purpose of having inserted in the RECORD at this point the amounts it is estimated the District will receive from these various classes of estates.

Mr. FREAR. The gentleman desires to have that appear in the RECORD? Of course, we have the total amount that is estimated of $750,000 in addition to what would be received on intangibles now, but we have not before us now the figures with respect to the various items.

Mr. STAFFORD. So no one can claim that Congress is attempting by these rates to levy any undue burden upon the denizens of the District who happen to own property and die here?

Mr. FREAR. This is lower than the average rates, and, of course, lower than the Federal rates.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the basis of the gentleman's estimate of $750,000 cover merely the average of years? As the gentleman knows, in Wisconsin the total returns vary by reason of occasions of haphazard deaths of persons of large wealth. What is the basis of the estimate that only $750,000 will be received by this inheritance tax bill?

Mr. FREAR. Of course, I can not go into the details as to what brought that out, but the average of the average city can be determined fairly well, and that is about all you have to go by, particularly in the case of the District. Of course, we know what the intangibles have been taxed in the past, but we do not know definitely, and I do not suppose such figures could be given with respect to receipts from decedents during a certain period, but they can consider the average in other cities of comparable size.

Mr. STAFFORD. No serious charge can be militated against the committee or the Congress that these rates are outlandishly high in comparison with inheritance tax rates in force in other States.

Mr. FREAR. They are below the average.

Mr. STAFFORD. Much below?

Mr. FREAR. I believe much below the average.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 8 of the bill to enable the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] to offer an amendment to clarify the language.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, my attention has been called by my colleague the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOILEAU] to the last provision, No. 10, where the bill states that on all net estates having a value in excess of $5,000,000 the tax imposed shall be at the rate of 15 per cent. This might be construed to be a tax upon the entire property at the rate of 15 per cent. So that will be changed to comply with the purpose of the committee through the amendment that I shall now offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. FREAR: On page 8, beginning with line 17, after the figure "(10)," strike out the remainder of the paragraph and insert in lieu thereof "over $5,000,000, 15 per cent."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MCMILLAN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5822) to provide a tax on the transfers of estates of decedents, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MAPES, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

GASOLINE TAX FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5823) to increase the motor-vehicle fuel tax in the District of Columbia, and to provide for the better administration thereof.

And pending that, I ask unanimous consent that general debate on the bill be limited to 30 minutes, 15 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Tennessee, Judge DAVIS, and 15 minutes by myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. MAPES was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. MCMILLAN in the chair.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, this bill was reported by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS], and I yield to him to make an explanation of the bill.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to myself. The bill under consideration increases the tax on gasoline in the District of Columbia from 2 to 4 cents per gallon.

The tax on gasoline is one of the fairest taxes we have, and just about as popular as any form of taxation can be.

It is a comparatively new tax. In 1919 the State of Oregon developed this new form of State tax and imposed a tax of 1 cent a gallon on gasoline. It proved to be popular from the beginning. Other States rapidly adopted this form of taxation, and now all the States of the Union impose a tax on gasoline, ranging from 2 cents to 7 cents per gallon.

The present average of this tax in all the States is somewhat over 4 cents a gallon. For eight years the District of Columbia has imposed a tax of 2 cents a gallon on gasoline.

To give you some idea of the tax in adjoining States, I will explain that the tax in Maryland is 4 cents, in North and South Carolina each, 6 cents; in Pennsylvania, 3 cents; in Virginia, 5 cents; and in West Virginia, 4 cents. So it will be seen that the motorists of the District of Columbia have been greatly favored in this respect. This tax is simple, inexpensive of administration, and easy of collection.

Mr. LARSEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes.

Mr. LARSEN. How much will this raise in the District of Columbia?

Mr. DAVIS. The additional tax will probably amount to $1,500,000 per annum. The motorists generally and the automobile interests have accepted this as being a fair and proper tax for the purpose of raising funds to construct and maintain our highways. This and the automobile license taxes have increased to such an extent that to-day the major portion of all of the highway and street expenses are paid in this manner. In that connection the auditor of the District of Columbia stated at the hearings of this select committee, that—

The amount of the gas-tax fund is not sufficient to take care of the entire street expense in the District of Columbia. About $2,000,000 will be paid in 1932 from the gasoline-tax fund, but in addition to that about $1,200,000 more will have to be provided out of the general revenues of the District of Columbia for maintenance and repairs to streets.

Consequently it will be seen that this additional tax is needed in the District of Columbia in order to properly maintain the highways of the District. The heavy motor vehicles do great damage to the streets and highways, requiring a constant repair bill, and, of course, that is particularly true in the cities. There is no reason why this expense should not be met here in large measure, as it is elsewhere, by a tax on gasoline.

Another feature which evidences the fairness of this tax is that the motorist pays the tax to the extent that he uses the highways. It is fairly proportioned. There is no reason, as this committee sees, why the District of Columbia and the citizens thereof and the motorists who visit the District of Columbia should not pay a tax somewhat comparable to the tax paid by the citizens of other sections of the country.

The city of Washington has a very large number of visitors constantly. Many of them come in their own automobiles, and as a matter of course the motorists who visit the National Capital generally purchase gasoline while in the city, and will in that manner contribute to the gasoline fund for the maintenance of the streets of the District, as they should. I do not see how there can be any objection to the passage of the bill. In that connection, I call attention to a statement by Mr. William P. Richards, who is the District tax assessor. In an article which appeared in yesterday's Evening Star, Mr. Richards is quoted as saying that the proposal to increase the gasoline tax to 4 cents per gallon has his approval, since it would raise more revenue for expenditure on streets, and in his opinion more revenue is needed. He also expressed approval of the substitution of the weight tax for the automobile license, to replace the present personal property tax, because the tax on vehicles should be proportioned to the damage they do to the streets; that refers to the bill which will follow this one. In this connection, with respect to a bill which the committee has already reported and which has passed the House, Mr. Richards makes a further statement that the income tax is better than one on intangible personal property, because it is easier on the poor and harder on the rich.

The bill under consideration is one of four bills which have the recommendation and unanimous support of the members of the select committee. We think it is an important bill, that it is eminently fair, and that it will result in raising a considerable amount of additional revenue in the District of Columbia. [Applause.]

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLARD].

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Chairman and ladies and gentlemen of the House, I thank the gentleman from Michigan for yielding me this minute. I want to read for your information a telegram I just received from the editor of the North American Review:

NEW YORK, December 16, 1931, 1 p. m.

CHARLES D. MILLARD,
House Office Building:

As your Westchester neighbor I desire to repeat following wire to MCFADDEN: "Your absurd performance yesterday is only making yourself ridiculous. If your intention is to hurt the President you are taking the wrong course. You will find the country strongly backing the administration against such tactics as you are apparently following."

WALTER B. MAHONEY,
Editor North American Review.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOGG].

VOLUME OF TAXES

Mr. HOGG of Indiana. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I am for the enactment of the bill. In 1890 the total expenditures by all Government authorities, local, State, and national, in the United States was $855,000,000. In 1903 it had increased to $1,570,000,000. In 1913 it was $2,919,000,000. In 1919 it had increased to $7,465,000,000. In 1923 the total was $10,265,000,000. There has been a steady increase since 1921 to more than $12,000,000,000 in 1930.

In 1913 the total per capita tax, local, State, and national, was $22.73. In 1923 it was $91.90, and in 1930 it was approximately $100 per person—man, woman, and child.

Except during war-time periods State and local taxes have overshadowed Federal collections. But Federal collections are amounting to far too great a total.

FEDERAL TAX TREND

Our Federal Budget is more than fourteen times what it was in 1890 and seven times what it was in 1913. During the war the Federal Government collected more than 60 per cent of the total tax bill. Now, the United States Government collects only one-third of the total bill.

The program of Federal tax reduction beginning in 1921 reduced the 1922 collections to $3,487,000,000. In 1924 another Federal tax revision bill was passed, further reducing rates and narrowing the subject of taxation, which brought the total down to $2,966,000,000. In 1926 was still further downward revision. The result was an increase in the amount of taxes collected.

DOLLAR'S VALUE VARIES

The taxes collected by governmental agencies are paid in dollars which have a varying purchasing power from year to year according to value fluctuation.

To show the real trend of tax collection over a period of years it is necessary to convert the annual value of taxation to the common standard of dollars of constant purchasing power. For comparison the value of the dollar in 1913 is used as a basis. Prices reached their highest level in 1919 and were twice the prices of 1913. Half of the increase in the volume of taxes to 1919 was due to the decrease in the value of the dollar.

Within the past year taxes have in reality been greatly increased for the reason that they were levied to be paid in dollars of less value than 1913 dollar value. A taxpayer to-day pays his tax with a dollar worth vastly more than it was two years ago.

To illustrate, although the per capita tax is approximately $100 per person—that is, local, State, and national—in this country it is in effect greatly in excess of that amount, for the dollar to-day will buy vastly more than it would buy two years ago.

DIRECT PROPERTY TAX

Two-thirds of local and State taxes throughout the Nation are raised by a direct property tax. In too many instances a citizen does not list all of his property and justifies his action on the theory that other citizens do not list their property. When a taxpayer fails to list his property he merely passes the burden on to others. If all taxables were listed the pro rata burden would be less. It has been proposed as a remedy for this unjust condition that a State might refuse to recognize the owner's title to property not listed for taxation. Titles to notes, debts, and property not listed would then lose the validity in any court of the State where the law required their listing for taxation.

TAX-EXEMPT SECURITIES

Tax-exempt securities place a hard and unnecessary burden on other taxpayers. There are to-day more than $30,000,000,000 of totally and partially tax-exempt securities in the United States. In other words, one-twelfth of the estimated valuation of the Nation is in tax-exempt securities. That is one-third more than the value of all railroads and railroad equipment in the United States. The claim is often made that tax exemption aids in sale of public securities. Such argument is wrong. The soundness and the certainty are sufficient to guarantee their sales.

Tax-free securities made a tax-exempt class of citizens which is repugnant to the American sense of justice.

STATES' INDEBTEDNESS INCREASE

From 1923 to 1926 this bonded indebtedness of the States and their subdivisions increased from one billion to five and a quarter billion dollars. There has, of course, been a constant reduction of our national debt.

Since the war the tax bill of the Nation has been 10 per cent of the national income. In 1913 it was 6.4 per cent of the national income.

The total expenditures of local, State, and National Governments are classified in this fashion. Twenty-five and one-tenth per cent is spent for education, 24.1 per cent for national defense and the protection of person and property, 18.1 per cent for highways, 11.8 per cent for social welfare, and 10 per cent for general government.

FEDERAL EXPENDITURES

Of the $4,112,909,950 estimated Budget expenditures for 1933, $2,814,769,200 will be for national defense, including payment to veterans, Army and Navy expenditures, and payment of principal and interest on national debt. The sum of $983,000,000 is allocated alone to the relief of veterans. More than two-thirds of a billion dollars is allocated to the War and Navy Departments.

TAX EVADERS

It is a sad comment on the history of civilization that at all times in every country there has been a class of people who is willing to appropriate unto itself advantages denied to other classes in the state. The civil governor of ancient times was not only the law in too many instances but above it as well. The feudal lord, the nobility of many nations, took for themselves rights which they denied others. And so to-day there are two classes of people who are willing to enjoy the advantages of local, State, and National Government, but who escape all responsibility which they can in its expense.

A privileged class has no place in a free government. Our privileged class in taxation consists of those who, by tax laws and constitutional exemption, are protected legally from paying a just contribution to the expenses of government. Second, those who avoid listing their property for taxation.

American sense of fair play has yet failed to reach a too large per cent of tax dodgers. If all citizens made their just contribution by listing their assets, then the burden would not fall so heavily on tax-honest citizens.

Tax-exempt securities often lead a subdivision of government into reckless spending. It is bad, not only for the taxpayers but for the State itself.

COURSE TO PURSUE

States and their subdivisions should follow the course set by President Hoover in a substantial decrease in their respective budgets. The only road to lower taxes is decreased expenditures. In this the Federal Government should set the example by consolidation of Federal bureaus and commissions and a decrease in the number of Government employees in normal times.

NO SALES TAX

In times like these a great body of American citizens are taxed beyond their capacity to pay. How can a man with a family of four contribute $500, directly and indirectly, to the public purse? To put an additional general sales tax on him is unjust. It is merely shifting the burden from those able to pay to those who are not able to pay. Taxes should be levied on those able to bear the burden.

The ever-increasing tax burden is one of the potential dangers to the future stability of our Government. As the total tax bill approaches the total income of America, we can clearly see how acute the problem is.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I believe the best thought in taxation requires that a man pay for the specialized service which he receives from the Government. In other words, those who use the roads should pay for the roads. Therefore, I believe one of the most just taxes that can be levied at this or any other time is the tax called for in the bill under discussion. [Applause.]

Mr. DAVIS. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, we were advised a few minutes ago by the majority leader [Mr. RAINEY] that in all probability the joint resolution to authorize the postponement of amounts payable to the United States from foreign governments would come before the House for action to-morrow. Since I found it would be impossible for me to discuss the matter at that time, I have asked this time for that purpose. I did not intend to express myself on the moratorium except by my vote. I had hoped to support the President, if possible. I feel that this is a question of great importance to our Nation and to the entire world. The question before us is whether or not this Nation should postpone the payment of the debts that are due and owing to us from European countries. It is a controversial subject, and the matter should have been placed before Congress before the President attempted to pledge our Government to a postponement.

As a representative of the American people, I consider my first duty to them. I would not utter an unfriendly word toward, or intentionally do an injustice to, a friendly nation. I have tried not to be swept from my feet by sentimental arguments, but have endeavored to solve this question with a cool and deliberate judgment, free from prejudice and sentiment. I spoke against and voted against the cancellation of our foreign debts in a former Congress. My views remain unchanged. Why should we grant a postponement to our foreign debtors and place the extra burden on the shoulders of our already too heavily taxed people? I will not ask debt favors for foreign countries that I would not ask for our own people also. Let us be fair. Give our own down-trodden people a debt holiday; grant them a postponement of taxes for a year's period, to catch up, so to speak. Millions of our citizens are unemployed. Multitudes of men, women, and little children are facing actual want, hunger, and starvation, willing to work and exchange their labor for a livelihood, but unable to secure employment. They are appealing to us for relief. Their problem is our problem. Charity should begin at home.

As one of our distinguished Members from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK] recently quoted, "the quality of mercy is not strained." Let it fall, then, on the millions of the good people within the confines of our own borders.

These great problems concern not only the people of the debtor nations but all the people of the United States. After carefully listening to the debate and studying the questions involved, I honestly believe that President Hoover's proposal for a moratorium on war debts and reparations is unjust and unfair to the American taxpayer. This moratorium is closely interwoven with complete cancellation of our foreign debts. It is the entering wedge for complete cancellation.

Hoover's proposal for an international debt holiday means that no reparations are to be collected from Germany by her debtors; no payments to be made by Europe on war debts to the United States for a period of one year. The effect of this was a loan of approximately $400,000,000 to Germany, as she would have to pay that amount on reparations. According to the Treasury Department, this generosity on the part of Congress will cost us approximately $252,000,000; that is, what is due us this year on our foreign debts. This is another donation to Europe. As a result of this, all Europe feels that we have committed ourselves to the ultimate cancellation of the war debts and the postwar loans which were lumped at the time of settlement. Our Government borrowed from our people the money which we loaned these European nations, and we must repay this money, principal and interest. We must redeem our Liberty bonds, which were issued for the money we borrowed to make these loans. The people of the United States will be taxed to make up the amounts lost by these gigantic gifts to our foreign debtors. In making these loans, a contract of payment was made, and I believe that contract should be kept with the same faith that the law of this country demands of individuals. Contracts between nations ought to be as strictly kept as between individuals. I am sure that the many patriotic business, professional, laboring men, and farmers in my district, who subscribed to the various Liberty loans until it hurt, will not be given a chance to settle their debts in accordance with their capacity to pay. Our farmers borrowed from our Federal Government under the farm loan act; they are expected to pay; many of them are now unable to pay. Their mortgages are being foreclosed and their homes sold, yet I do not hear one word about settling with the tax-burdened American people in accordance with their capacity to pay. Banks are closing back in Ohio. Economic conditions are very bad. We must restore confidence, or no one can predict what will happen to our institutions and our Government.

You tell us the terrible consequences that will arise if we do not support the moratorium. I do not desire to be hard-hearted, cold, or indifferent to the troubles of other nations, nor do I think that we should be sentimental about them on the one hand and indifferent to our own troubles on the other. There are too many in this country pulling for foreign debtors, with our own country and its interests neglected and left in the rear. We find the European nations for themselves—first, last, and all the time—and properly so. May I ask again, Is this a fair proposition to the American taxpayer? Our people will think more about these things than this Congress has done.

I am going to vote against this moratorium, because I am not going to do the taxpayers of America an injustice, if I know it. With the dire distress of my country and district, especially in the farming, industrial, and mining communities, I do not believe that my people are any more able to pay their taxes than are the people of Europe to pay their taxes. The American people would welcome a moratorium. If we do not pay our debts in America, they grab all our property and sell it without asking any questions. Millions of people in this country now facing actual want, hunger, and starvation would be thankful to have payment of their debts postponed. We are reducing the burdens of the people of other nations but transferring it to the backs of our own people. I know this is the wrong policy.

Our debt to Europe has been paid. We sent 2,000,000 of our boys over there. We raised 4,500,000 men for the Army and Navy for the purpose of prosecuting the war. We furnished and financed virtually $9,500,000,000 worth of supplies, not only for the Allied Governments, but we helped feed their civilian population also. We entered the great World War to vindicate America's honor; we saved the Allies from defeat; we went to their rescue in the hour of need. After the war ended and peace came we did not ask or claim any of the spoils of war. The war had cost us $9,500,000,000. France took her $5,000,000,000 of war reparations. Many of the European nations extended their domains and made rich territorial gains and wealth. At the close of the war those who were victorious took their share of the spoils. America did not ask for anything. America did not receive anything.

This moratorium is just another step in the scheme by international bankers for the ultimate cancellation of our foreign debts. Those who favored cancellation will attempt to reopen these settlements and make additional reductions in the future. This agitation for complete cancellation will be continued. If we are going to cancel these interallied debts in whole or in part, by moratorium or otherwise, why not say so openly and candidly. Why should we put over proposals like these without telling the American people what we are doing and their ultimate effect; why camouflage and conceal the real truth from the American taxpayer?

I do not believe that the taxpayers of my congressional district, if they fully understand this moratorium, are in any frame of mind to make additional donations to our foreign debtors. Our previous loans—short-term loans and war debts—now amount to approximately $28,000,000,000. We have provided European nations with credit and money until they have become dependent upon us. They have used part of these loans to enrich themselves by internal improvements and industrial expansion. They have borrowed in some cases more than they needed. They are building and maintaining extravagant armies, navies, and war equipment. They have been using our money and credit in making preparations for another war. Europe is not going to sink in despair. European nations are not going to starve. The are not going bolshevik if we refuse to extend further financial help and credit at this time. They must learn to live within their means. They should stop building large armies, navies, and armaments, endangering the peace of the world.

We have the unemployment menace in our country. We have serious economic troubles. We have difficult problems confronting us in our domestic affairs. Is it not time that we stopped extending credit to other nations until we set our own house in order? I am fed up and tired of listening to the arguments of the international bankers for further reduction and cancellation of our foreign debts. The problem confronting Congress is a solution of our own ills. To these problems Congress should devote itself. I oppose re-creating the World War Debt Commission. I oppose cancellation. I oppose this movement of the international bankers to postpone payment. I shall cast my vote against the moratorium. I protest with my voice and vote against this additional tax burden on the American people. I believe that every fair-minded voter and taxpayer of my country and district will approve my action. [Applause.]

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. McMILLAN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5823) to increase the motor-vehicle fuel tax in the District of Columbia and to provide for the better administration thereof, had directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MAPES, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

REGISTRATION OF MOTOR VEHICLES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5824) to require the registration of motor vehicles in the District of Columbia, to prescribe registration fees based upon the weight of such motor vehicles, and for other purposes. Pending that motion, I ask unanimous consent that general debate on the bill be limited to 1 hour and 30 minutes, 45 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] and 45 minutes by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 5824; and pending that motion, he asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to one hour and a half, 45 minutes to be controlled by himself and 45 minutes by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5824) to require the registration of motor vehicles in the District of Columbia, to prescribe registration fees based upon the weight of such motor vehicles, and for other purposes, with Mr. McMILLAN in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may desire to use.

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, this is the fourth bill reported and recommended by the Select Committee on Fiscal Relations between the District of Columbia and the United States. It provides for the registration of motor vehicles in the District of Columbia and fixes the rates upon a weight basis. Perhaps some of the new Members will be surprised when they are told that until now the license fee for a motor vehicle in the District of Columbia has been $1, whether that motor vehicle be a Ford roadster or the largest bus or largest truck. Of course, no situation is comparable anywhere else in the country. It has been fully determined and is generally recognized that the fair basis for taxing automobiles is in accordance with their weight. The reason for that, of course, is that the heavier the vehicles the greater damage they do to the highways and streets and the more room they take up on the highways. This tax, imposed by way of license fees upon automobiles, is in vogue in every jurisdiction in the United States. The average license fee in all of the States amounts to about $14 per car. In the District of Columbia, as stated, the license fee is $1 per vehicle. It is true that in the District of Columbia they tax, or are presumed to tax, automobiles as personal property. However, the same thing is done in 34 of the States of the Union. Even counting the tax as personal property on automobiles and counting the $1 license fee the average for the District of Columbia last year was only $3.79 per motor vehicle.

We have thoroughly examined the laws in force in the various States of the Union, and have undertaken to draft a bill according to the modern trend, so as to create a license fee of certainly not more than the average in the country, and I think it will prove to be somewhat under the average so far as this law will produce revenue in the District of Columbia.

We have just passed a gasoline tax bill; and, as I stated then, it is one of the recognized legitimate forms of taxation for the purpose of constructing and maintaining our highways and streets. A motor vehicle license law with a graded scale, and in accordance with weight and size, is likewise generally recognized as an entirely proper and legitimate form of taxation for the same purpose.

These two methods of taxing automobiles are generally accepted by the public, by the automobile industry, and by the motorists themselves as being the fairest method of raising taxes in order, as I say, to construct and maintain the highways upon which the automobiles operate. They are all more than willing to pay their proportion of these taxes in order to be able to operate their vehicles over good highways. The present Chief of the Bureau of Public Roads well says that we pay for good roads whether we have them or not, and we pay more if we do not have them than if we have them. In other words, the expense of operating automobiles over bad roads is a great deal more, as compared to operating them over good roads, than the automobile expense in the form of a gasoline tax and a license fee. So it is economy, from their standpoint, as well as a legitimate method of relieving property of taxation with respect to the maintenance of our highways.

Mr. THATCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes.

Mr. THATCHER. What is the estimate of the revenue to be raised under this bill with the present number of automobiles in the District?

Mr. DAVIS. Well, it is estimated it will raise, as I recall—and, of course, it is only an estimate——

Mr. THATCHER. I know; but just approximately.

Mr. DAVIS. It will increase the present collections on automobiles about $1,200,000 a year; and in this connection I wish to state that this bill repeals the tax upon automobiles as personal property and substitutes this weight tax for the present license fee and the property tax.

Mr. THATCHER. No ad valorem tax will obtain if this bill becomes law.

Mr. DAVIS. No. This bill, together with the preceding bill, will doubtless raise sufficient additional revenue to properly maintain the streets of the District of Columbia and to provide reasonable extensions and improvements. This is what should be done, just as is done almost everywhere else.

I wish to state also that Mr. William P. Richards, the District tax assessor, in an interview which is published in the press, expresses his approval of the substitution of the weight tax for automobile licenses and to replace the personal-property tax, because the tax on vehicles should be proportionate to the damage they do the streets.

Mr. BURTNESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes.

Mr. BURTNESS. I have a number of questions I would like to ask the gentleman, but I do not want to interfere with his argument. I will ask him now if that is satisfactory. Fundamentally, is this bill a bill for taxing the automobiles or for regulating the automobiles?

Mr. DAVIS. Both. In that connection I wish to state that what I mean by that is that it fixes rates for license fees predicated upon weight, and so forth, and it also has some provisions regulating the size of motor vehicles in accordance with provisions that are in vogue in Pennsylvania, in Virginia, and in most of the States, and which are embraced in the model automobile act which has been published by the Department of Commerce pursuant to an international conference on the subject.

Mr. BURTNESS. I realize, of course, there are many regulatory features in the bill. I was wondering if it was to be regarded primarily as a taxation bill, a revenue measure, and, if so, whether there may not be serious question as to its constitutionality—that is, unless it is to be regarded largely as a regulatory measure—because you are going to tax property without any regard whatsoever to its value and only with reference to its weight. For instance, you are going to tax an old automobile——

Mr. DAVIS. Even the rates themselves are regulatory in character, because the rate is increased in proportion to the size, on the theory that the heavier the car the more damage it will work.

In addition to this we make a distinction in the tax between pneumatic tires and solid tires and metal tires, as they do in practically all jurisdictions, and for the same reason, and that is because of the relative damage they do, and I think to discourage, particularly, the use of metal tires.

Mr. BURTNESS. I think there are very many splendid features in the bill in that regard, but the thing I can not quite get through my head is this: If this bill is to be more than a regulatory bill and is to be actually a tax measure, why you should tax an automobile that is 10 or more years old with as large a tax as you impose upon a brand new car. Most of these old cars are heavy, and some of them may not be used more than 1,000 miles during a season.

Mr. DAVIS. In that respect I want to say that only two States of the Union impose a license fee in accordance with the value. The larger car will pay a larger license fee under this bill, because even upon passenger cars the rate is fixed by weight; in other words, a Packard car will pay as much more than a Chevrolet as there is difference in weight, and we think that in a degree reaches the value question, and in a more logical way and in accordance with the trend of legislation in all the States on this subject.

Mr. BURTNESS. Of course, there are many States that take other factors than weight into consideration. They take power into consideration, some take value into consideration, and they take age into consideration or a combination of such factors. There are various types of legislation in the various States.

Mr. DAVIS. I know that is true, but the vast majority of States fix the rate upon weight.

Mr. BURTNESS. Upon weight alone, does the gentleman mean?

Mr. DAVIS. Some of them use weight and horsepower. I have some figures here on that subject.

Mr. BURTNESS. I do not want to take up too much of the gentleman's time.

Mr. DAVIS. As the gentleman knows, there is not very much difference between weight and capacity.

Twenty States of the Union fix their license fees based upon weight, 2 upon weight and capacity, 22 upon capacity, 1 on horsepower, 1 on value, and 1 on capacity and horsepower. So in drafting this bill we certainly are in line with an overwhelming percentage of the States of the Union, and certainly with the trend of the legislation. We have undertaken to draft a bill which is modern and one which has been proved by experience in the different States to be the best way of meeting the situation.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS. I yield.

Mr. FREAR. The question has been raised whether or not a car that is worth, say, $10,000 ought to pay a fee based entirely on weight. If the gentleman sees fit to offer an amendment to strike out section 7, of course, that would bring up the question for a test, because then the bill would permit the personal-property tax to be levied.

Mr. BURTNESS. Of course, if the personal property tax is to remain, I think it must be agreed that it would be unreasonable to provide as high a regulatory fee as is provided in this bill. I am frank to say, just as an offhand proposition, it would seem fairer to me to let the personal tax remain rather than to assess every car purely upon its weight, without any regard whatsoever to its age or its value; particularly so now, after you have passed a bill in the House, which I hope will become a law, increasing the gasoline tax 2 cents, which will be paid, of course, by the people who use the streets of Washington the most. I think this is entirely in harmony with what is fair treatment; but I doubt whether it is fair treatment in the case, for instance, of retired Government clerks, with small incomes, who 10 years ago may have been able to buy an automobile and who are able to keep that old car and use it for their pleasure a few hundred or a few thousand miles a year. We all know that cars made many years ago were heavier than comparable cars are now, and under this bill the owners of old cars may have to pay more for a license than they could sell cars for to-day.

Mr. DAVIS. I want to say that I am in strong sympathy with the gentleman's idea. My State has both taxes—a license tax of 6 cents a gallon and a horsepower tax—and a weight tax on carriers for hire. This is simply an effort to be fair with the District of Columbia, together with the further fact that it is more certain and definite and easy of enforcement, and further, because not a great deal has been raised heretofore by the personal-property tax.

As a matter of fact, it was stated by one of the officials that there were 30,000 cars operating here that paid no personal-property tax on the ground that they did not consider them of any value.

Mr. ADKINS. You have here a gasoline tax, a license tax, and a property tax; and is not that pretty generally the average in the various States? Is not this in line with what they have in other States?

Mr. DAVIS. The method of taxing automobiles varies considerably in detail, and we have undertaken to establish a happy medium in this bill. Some have one provision and not others, and some will have provisions very much higher than they are in other States. I think the bill we have reported will raise the tax fairly comparable with the surrounding jurisdictions.

Mr. STAFFORD. I suppose the committee did not intend to drive off the streets of Washington these old, discarded heavy-weight cars of the vintage of years ago. This bill will drive them out of existence.

Mr. DAVIS. Oh, I do not think so. I do not think any man who owns one of these cars will be badly hurt when he can get a license at such a small expense.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman knows that these cars of 5 and 10 years back are heavier than comparable cars are to-day.

Mr. DAVIS. In Virginia they have a minimum of $12.25. Many States have a minimum charge in excess of what it would be under this bill.

Mr. BURTNESS. What will the smallest tax be under this bill?

Mr. DAVIS. Well, at 50 cents a hundred pounds, the gentleman can figure that.

Mr. BURTNESS. I have not been getting the information which the committee has. Of course, I know at 50 cents a hundred pounds a car weighing 3,000 pounds would pay $15 for a license.

Mr. DAVIS. Some of them would be as low as seven or eight dollars.

Mr. BURTNESS. Yes; for cars like the Austin—but we do not see many of them on the streets. What does a Ford weigh, for instance—does not that weigh upwards of 3,000 pounds?

Mr. DAVIS. I do not think so; a Ford sedan under this bill would pay about $8. However, I decline to yield any further.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time. I will ask the Chair how much time I have consumed?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. OLIVER of New York). The gentleman has consumed 25 minutes.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this is the last of the four bills reported by the committee to be taken up in the House. The committee expresses its appreciation for the reception the House has given to the three bills which have already been considered.

This bill under consideration now is, the committee thinks, a model motor vehicle weight tax bill, based on the best thought and legislation of States in regard to taxing automobiles or motor vehicles.

However, I did not rise to discuss this particular bill, but before its disposition I want to make an additional statement in regard to the general subject matter under consideration by this committee.

At the outset let me say that, for one, I do not intend now, nor in the future, to attempt to run down or to answer all of the statements and criticisms which may be made of the work and the report of this committee. The report speaks for itself and, in my judgment, answers every criticism which has been made of it in so far as the merits are concerned.

It is easy to understand the attitude of the District. It is perfectly natural and human. At the same time it is well to keep in mind that in exercising legislative jurisdiction over the District of Columbia, Congress is not usurping any power. It is only carrying out the mandate of the Constitution. Reference is sometimes made to the Boston Tea Party and "Voteless Washington." The fathers who sat in the Constitutional Convention in 1787 and framed the Constitution were quite as familiar with the Boston Tea Party as we in this day are. It was a matter of recent history with them. In spite of that fact they deliberately wrote into the Constitution the provision which requires Congress to exercise exclusive legislative jurisdiction over the District of Columbia. Congress is obliged to exercise this power, whether or no, whether it chooses to do so or not. It is an obligation enjoined upon Congress which, in the performance of its duty, it can not escape, however unpleasant it may be.

As set forth in the report of the committee, in the performance of this obligation it has a dual responsibility. It must represent the people of the District and the people who live outside the District. It, of course, wants to be fair to both.

I do not want any Member of the House of Representatives to get the idea from anything that he may have heard or read that this committee did not hold hearings. It did. It invited before the committee and heard representatives of the District government and of different civic organizations within the District, as well as private individuals who desired to be heard. It heard everyone who expressed a desire to be heard up to the time the hearings of the committee closed, and it gave every witness who appeared before the committee full opportunity to express himself as he saw fit.

I have here a copy of the hearings. It is a volume of over 500 pages.

A distinguished member of another body was quoted in the Evening Star of yesterday and the morning Post of to-day as saying:

> I haven't seen the full report, but the details that have been reported are what was to be expected from a committee organized in pursuance of a resolution that was introduced in a spirit of controversy with the position of the Senate.

> It is really a defi.

I hope that no one will read the report with that attitude of mind. It is in no sense a "defi" or a challenge to anyone.

The members of the committee were charged with the duty of recommending to the House what amount, in the language of the resolution creating it, "in their judgment," not the judgment of some one else, "the United States should contribute annually toward the development and maintenance of the municipality" of the District of Columbia. They have performed that duty, and they have given the facts upon which their judgment is based, and the reasons for it in the report which has been submitted to the House.

As stated in the report, the committee has endeavored—> to give the House sufficient statistical information and data to enable every Member, not only now but in the future, to reach his own conclusion, from the information given, as to what the contribution of the Federal Government toward the expenses of the District government should be. The committee considers this feature of its report of prime importance.

Of course, the committee takes no responsibility for the conclusions of others, either before or after a study of the information and data given.

Lest we forget! I desire to quote, and I do so, with approval of the sentiment expressed, from the testimony of a witness before the joint committee of 1915, Mr. Herbert J. Browne:

> * * * the government of no city in America has been quicker to respond to an intelligent and fairly expressed public need and sentiment than Congress to the requirements of the District of Columbia. Unselfish opinion can prevail here, and if a thought may be expressed, it is that Congress has been so unwisely lavish in its attempted beneficence that a powerful landholding element has been created which demands as a right what has been granted as a subsidy.

I thank you.

Mr. THATCHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. THATCHER. As a matter of information, did your committee have before it the report of the Bureau of Efficiency?

Mr. MAPES. It did.

Mr. THATCHER. Is that included in the hearings?

Mr. MAPES. It is in a separate document.

Mr. THATCHER. And that was considered by the gentleman's committee?

Mr. MAPES. Very carefully and very fully and rejected in toto.

I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I rise to follow along the same line of thought just expressed by the chairman of the committee. I call attention to the fact that I have disclosed to the House that the unanimous report of the committee would have brought in $14,000,000 from the District of Columbia in addition to what they now collect if we had invoked a personal-property tax and a real-estate tax equal to the comparable 22 cities we have had under consideration. As the chairman well says, the tea party up in Massachusetts is being discussed in the District of Columbia. There are various organizations in the District of Columbia, from Swampoodle, as they used to call it back in the days when I lived here, and Anacostia and other places which are being organized to tell the American Congress what the organization will do and what it will not do. Of course, that protest is quite imposing in a way. It is a voteless District, as they well say; but that is written into the Constitution, as Chairman MAPES has said. We can not change it. Washington wrote it there particularly so that District residents could not control all of the Federal property here. These organizations say they want the right to vote. It is a demand in the papers of yesterday and to-day. Do you know what would occur if that attempt is made and we offered to them an amendment to the Constitution? It would go back to the 48 States, and what would they say? Would three-fourths of the States give the right to the District when they knew that $14,000,000 should be raised in the District of Columbia in taxes to bring it on a par with all of the cities outside? Do you think that? Try it. Not a single State would agree to the vote amendment.

It is offered, I fear, just to befuddle the issue. Anyone who lives in the District of Columbia by traveling 5 or 6 miles can get over into the State of Maryland where he will pay an increased tax, as people do outside the District, or he can go into Virginia, where also they pay a higher tax than here; but I do not hear of any exodus from the District of Columbia by these organizations that are complaining about a voteless District.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. I suggest that there is a movement as the gentleman knows to restore that part of the District which is now in Virginia to the District of Columbia.

Mr. FREAR. Then they might move out a little farther and retain the advantage of the lighter tax.

Mr. SIMMONS. That movement had its inception in a desire to get the low tax rates and the privileges of the District.

Mr. FREAR. No man of any intelligence or honesty of purpose will say that a member of this committee purposely acted unfairly or was prejudiced in the hearings or in the decision. We have endeavored as best we could to accept positions that we did not want. We were placed on this committee by the Speaker of the House, and we have undertaken our task fairly and honestly and without fear. That is one of the troubles with the American Congress to-day. Why do we not impose a tax on these people that they ought to pay? No argument has been made here in favor of levying $9,000,000 additional taxes on real and personal property. Of course the Legislative Committee on the District of Columbia can impose a $9,000,000 additional real and personal tax if it chooses, and it ought to impose this tax to equalize taxes generally. There is no just reason for not doing so.

We are confronted with a statement of which the chairman speaks and which I noted last evening in the press. It is my desire to keep within parliamentary rules, and if I do not I hope some one will call me to order. A gentleman was quoted wherein he said he felt that the organization of the Mapes committee was a defy—I do not know whether to him or to the Senate or to whom, or to the District. We never knew of his feeling in the matter then nor at anytime before. I do not think a member of our committee had any thought of a defy, and I do not know what the gentleman means by it. I do know this, that the gentleman in question was given the most liberal condemnation that ever came to any man in Congress on either side, so far as I remember, because of his attitude when he first came to Congress to influence the tariff bill, all under particular circumstances. The record is well known. I have this in mind and it is a very tender thought.

This gentleman, who stands constantly in the spotlight, who gets his reward in the columns of the local press, tells us the Mapes committee is a defy. The other day he went down to the Philippines, and the little brown men were to be pitched out into the sea because he was not satisfied with their position or demand for independence. He had all the experience of a few hours down there to determine the merits of the great question by this newcomer who constantly is in the press. He says this committee is a defy to him, I take it, possibly because he occupies a position where he feels that it is trespassing upon his exclusive rights to determine all legislative matters. If the House of Representatives does its duty, it may say to him and to anyone at the other end of the Capitol or elsewhere, and to the people who are going to move out of the District or threatened to, "You pay your fair amount of taxes before you come here and ask for a District dole." Why not, I ask you. We are all taxpayers. What right has anyone to make this a place where there can be tax evasion and tax dodging, which has been its reputation for all of these years. The press and residents say, "We ought to have all of the advantages of a capital city" and a far less tax to pay. No city in the entire world, with one exception, gives a dole to the people of that city because the Capital happens to be located there. The proper thing for the House of Representatives, which is equal in its legislative power to the Senate, I submit, is to say to anybody who complains about a defy, "Let the District of Columbia pay what it should pay in taxes and what is right; then we will determine the amount of the dole, whether it is to be one million or six million." Suppose they say, "We will not pay it; we will continue to belabor Congress"? What will you do? What will the average city do? Why not say if you do not tax yourselves, you get no dole. Every city must tax itself to meet expenses. That is the only way every other city in the world except Washington has to do. Why not put that proposition right up to these people who are complaining about a "defy"? There is no other person that I know of who has ever been a "defy" more than the gentleman who fears at this time that he is confronted with a defy from the House of Representatives. Of course, we never had him in mind. Not a member of the committee ever spoke of him or ever thought of him. That might be unfortunate to his pride and he might regret it. He may think he occupies the same position there that he thought he occupied in another body. I do not know of anyone here who pays any attention to him or cares about him. When he says, "It is a defy," I say he was never thought of, and he magnifies his own importance.

The suggestion is made by a Member sitting before me that he wants to get in the newspapers. How can I deny it? It is an easy way to get into the newspapers, by "defending" the District. You can always do it here. You can always get into the papers if you are a "defender" of the District. There was not a "defender" here yesterday who would have risen in his place and attempted to speak against one of the bills which we were considering. They are the same bills that are put in force in other places. Why should not the District of Columbia pay the same? Why should its people be a specially favored class? I say that because I have lived in the District of Columbia. I thought it was the most fortunate place in the world to live. It is the most beautiful city—and I have been in nearly every capital city, I believe, in Europe. There is no city the world over that compares with the city of Washington, and yet these people, with all these privileges, with $200,000,000, approximately, being paid out every year for employment and other purposes by the Federal Government do not want to pay their just taxes. As my friend from Texas yesterday said, it gives them new bills, yet we know they complain and they are going to organize a tea party headed by the gentleman who fears there is a defy. With all of his epaulets and shoulder straps and the bonnet with feather he is going to wear at that time, he is going to tell the people of the District of Columbia how they have been burdened and how unfortunate they are. He will lead his army against just taxes. Just think of the absurdity of a situation like that in this undertaxed District.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I yield. I am glad to yield to a man who knows more about the District than I do.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to call attention to the fact that all of that apparent animosity which led that distinguished gentleman from Connecticut to imagine and voice the defy came from the newspapers. They get mad at the House, and they run over somewhere else and find somebody to voice their sentiments, and it came from a Republican from the State of Connecticut, if you please. He is not willing to admit that $6,500,000 is enough of the people's money to contribute to the civic expenses of this District. But some day his people back home will become posted on the subject.

Mr. FREAR. In addition to the four million that we are just providing for here through income, estate, gas, and auto taxes.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; and I want the gentleman to call attention to the statement that I put into the hearings of his committee on these bills from your former distinguished member of the District Committee, Mr. Johnson, of Kentucky, wherein he said that even in his day if you figured up the balance, the District of Columbia would owe the Federal Government $50,000,000 for extra handouts that had been given to them up to that time. That is in the hearings from your former distinguished chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. FREAR. I thank the gentleman for his contribution. And let me say that I was here when Chairman Johnson was chairman of that committee. That was many years ago. When a District bill was pending he was pilloried nearly every day by the local press. My good friend Mr. SIMMONS, of Nebraska, has been abused and Cramton has been abused. No man can satisfy the people of the District of Columbia in the matter of taxes. The press is not that way in the ordinary cities. They give you fair treatment. They give people who are trying to do their duty credit for that purpose, but the Federal Treasury is here and the disposition is to get their fingers in with the expectation of lessening taxes. I would not put an undue tax on the District. I want to make this city the most beautiful city in the world, which it is to-day. There is no city that compares with it, and I accept the criticism of the city by my good friend, Mr. LAGUARDIA, of New York, when he says there are portions of this city that ought to be improved, cleaned up. With that I agree. They should be cleaned up, but as a whole the city is a wonderful city, second to none, and I would keep it so. If it pays $14,000,000 increased taxes the committee has found to be just and right, it will save the Federal Treasury to that extent.

Mr. BLANTON. Our friends, the newspapers here, get mad when we mention them, but they mention us whenever they get ready. They give us "h" whenever they get ready, and my policy is to give them "h" in return when they deserve it.

Mr. FREAR. Which "h" does the gentleman mean?

Mr. BLANTON. They know what "h" I am talking about.

Mr. FREAR. Well, I want to say this in justice to the newspapers. I have never felt but that I had a square deal from any paper outside of this city. I have taken the floor here when the Wall Street Journal published a long editorial criticizing me and what I had said. When I corrected the paper it published my full explanation in the same editorial column, which was eminently fair.

The same is true of the New York Times, and there is no stronger or better paper in the country than that. Those papers, and practically all others outside the District, do treat us fairly. But, as was pictured here yesterday, we ourselves sometimes belittle our Congress. Untrue statements are made and they are not resented. I will say that there is not a man in this body—and I do not care who he is or where he is—whom I would not place higher in comparison with a publisher I have in mind. I am not going to mention his name, but his record and character speak for themselves. You must have some reputation, my friends, to be here. You have to be respectable and responsible. You go to your constituents and say, "This is my record." If it is right, they will quickly discover it. Sent here by constituencies of between 200,000 and 300,000, we are treated like a lot of lackeys by men who want the spot light—such as this man who is looking for a defy. Will he get it? All the rest of us are put in the attitude of injuring the District, which I am certain not a man on this floor would do.

Now, my friends, I was placed here to close this discussion.

Mr. GLOVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Certainly.

Mr. GLOVER. I think the gentleman from North Dakota asked a very pertinent question a moment ago with reference to this, as to whether it was to regulate or was a tax to raise revenue. Does the gentleman know whether or not this question has been passed on, that you can put a tax on personal property to produce revenue without having any regard whatever for its value?

Mr. FREAR. It has been done right in the District of Columbia for years with the automobiles. They have taxed them $1.

Mr. BURTNESS. Oh, no. If the gentleman will permit, under the law up to this time in the District of Columbia, automobiles have presumably been taxed for their full value.

Mr. FREAR. Oh, no.

Mr. BURTNESS. Wait a minute. Presumably, I said. They have provided a registration tax of $1, which is an entirely different matter.

Mr. FREAR. It has nothing to do with the registration tax, and that, I knew, was the gentleman's mistake. Many of their cars are paying a personal-property tax of $1, if I recollect the hearings correctly.

Mr. GLOVER. What I started to say was that the report says it is for the purpose of raising revenue. That is stated in the report. If there is any controversy over that, it ought to be settled now. I believe there ought to be a weight tax in it, but I think a property tax should also be carried, so there can be no question about this being a legitimate tax.

Mr. FREAR. Then the gentleman's proposal would mean the striking out of section 7, which the gentleman will have the opportunity of doing. The committee has in every instance attempted to be fair and just and hold things down below the average, and it was for that reason we did not put the property value in. We get little credit for anything we have done. We will get criticisms, but we do not care about them, because we are not here to satisfy any people except our own consciences. I am speaking now generally. If the gentleman feels that personal-property tax is right, he can offer an amendment and, of course, he may have some following on it. We did not.

Mr. GLOVER. My idea is that a car ought to be taxed according to its value. There might be a car weighing 5,000 pounds that would not be worth very much at all.

Mr. FREAR. I can understand that, and we all understand that. Of course, there is no question about that. If the gentleman wants to undertake it he can offer an amendment.

Mr. GLOVER. I think I shall.

Mr. FREAR. That is the way to reach it.

Mr. BLANTON. There is a property tax here now, but the exemption is such that it practically takes all Fords, Chevrolets, and cars of that value out of the taxable class.

Mr. FREAR. I have understood that there were a whole lot of Fords and old machines that were taxed at $1 apiece. That is what I have in mind. It is not a registration fee, and I think it so appears in the hearings. The cars I have referred to were taxed at $1 each, an absurdity, of course, on the face of it. We have tried to give you orderly and businesslike bills drawn on the latest plans. I do not know whether they will get through the Senate or not, and, as far as that is concerned, it will not affect us at all. We have done our duty, and that is all we tried to do. We have recommended these bills for passage by the American Congress, but if in another body or any other place they say they will not yield, have your own recourse.

The House of Representatives is just as great a body and represents the American people just as much as any other legislative body in the world.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. Their greatest argument and their stock-in-trade argument is that it is taxation without representation.

Mr. FREAR. Yes; I know.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman knows that we have a special District legislative committee of 21 members who work constantly for Washington and represent the people here, and there are thousands of people living in the District of Columbia who vote on all national affairs in their various States. They go home to vote, and most of them are Republicans. I can understand why they are not very well represented now.

Mr. FREAR. Maybe they did not go home last year?

Mr. BLANTON. They are not taxed without representation; they are well represented here.

Mr. FREAR. Let me say to the gentleman in answer to that argument, which is made repeatedly, there are certain gentlemen who are afraid of a "defi," who represent them to-day. They represent them way beyond what you gentlemen would represent your districts or anyone else, because they are constantly here asking for things for the District because of the reward that is sure to come of additional publicity and criticism for failure.

We have worked hard to present these bills to you. We have no personal interest in them at all. You have passed them on to the Senate, and you have it in your hands through the legislative committee of the District later on to enact a law that will provide that these District people shall pay on real estate and on personal property the same taxes that are paid back in our States, and this is all that we have asked.

I thank you very much for your attention. [Applause.]

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAMNECK].

Mr. LAMNECK. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, I appear before you as a new Member. This is a great event for me, if not for you. I come here with the greatest determination to vote for all constructive legislation that is presented at this session of Congress. [Applause.]

I believe the people of my district, of Ohio, and of the Nation expect me to do this. My district has a population of about 400,000 people; farmers, business men, large and small. We have Democrats and Republicans, about equally divided. They have asked me to come to this session of Congress and tell the Congress what we think of various things and what sort of legislation we think should be enacted at this session, and through the generosity of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] I have this opportunity, which I appreciate very much.

To represent 400,000 people in the greatest legislative body in the world is a great privilege. I want to measure up to this responsibility. After telling you what we think, we do not care whether the legislation comes from the Republican side or from the Democratic side or from the Progressive element. They expect me to vote for legislation that is going to take us out of this terrible depression.

I wish I had the power to reflect to you the feeling of the people of my district—Republicans, Democrats, rich, poor, big business men, and little business men. They know we are in a terrible situation, and they do not expect us to play politics at this session of Congress, until, at least, the necessary things are out of the road.

One of the things they believe we should give first attention to is financial legislation. They do not think we ought to do anything with the Federal reserve act, or at least not very much, because its worth has been demonstrated a thousand times before this.

They expect me to vote for President Hoover's moratorium, and I am going to do it. [Applause.]

They expect me to vote for the home discount bank bill. In my city alone, ladies and gentlemen, we have in the building and loan associations $130,000,000—think of it—"deader than a doornail"; that we can not do a thing with unless some legislation of this kind is passed at this session.

The statement is made that if this bank bill is passed $60,000,000 will be immediately available for use in legitimate business.

People are in a terrible situation there because the public has lost confidence in the banks, and if there is anyone here who thinks we can run a business without banks and financial institutions, I would like to see him. I can not. In my manufacturing business I must use the banks.

Therefore I claim we have got to do something for the bankers, whether we like it or whether we do not like it. The public's confidence must be restored so that they will leave their money in the banks, and the banks' confidence must be restored so they will lend the money to legitimate business. In my judgment you will never have any prosperity in this country until this situation is solved.

Restoring public confidence is the first thing to do, and any legislation that will restore confidence is what we ought to vote for regardless of our political affiliations.

My people believe we ought to do something about the tariff. They believe we ought to revise the tariff. They believe the tariff has resulted in a large loss of world commerce. They point to the fact that in Canada alone 107 American manufacturers have built plants since the last tariff was passed. I do not claim to know anything about the tariff, but if that condition is true, there must be some reason for it.

I do know, however, of a situation that occurred with a customer of mine in New Zealand. He used to buy furnaces in this country and when the tariff bill was passed he quit buying furnaces here. When asked why he quit, he said:

> We can not buy furnaces in the United States any more because we have set up a retaliatory tariff, and we charge $75.60 for every $100 order that you ship to us.

With the retaliatory tariffs passed by 47 foreign countries, which have resulted in our losing world commerce, is it not about time that Democrats and Republicans should act together and revise the tariff, no matter what our record has been in the past on that important subject? [Applause.]

Another thing they believe we ought to do something about is prohibition. They believe—and I think I reflect the sentiment of my district—that prohibition has interfered with the consideration of subjects of greater importance. Just think of it! The President of the United States can not appoint a member of his Cabinet unless the question is asked whether he is wet or dry. A man can not be nominated for Congress unless he is asked the question whether he is wet or dry. A Senator or a governor of my State, or any State, can not be elected unless he is asked whether he is wet or dry. I hope the bill which will refer the question of prohibition to the States for ratification by constitutional convention will be enacted at this session.

Another thing you have heard about is the concentration of wealth in the hands of a few. I have heard it stated that 3 per cent of the people of this country own 93 per cent of the wealth. They want me to tell you to do something for the small men and women, the small business people, who have been forced back by this movement during the last 10 or 15 years, and they point to the fact that if that trend continues it will be only a short time before we will be a Nation of two classes, the rich and the poor, instead of a Nation of the rich and a great middle class. [Applause.]

Mr. HORR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAMNECK. Yes.

Mr. HORR. Mr. Chairman, I am very much interested in the remarks of the gentleman that prohibition is not, and should not be, an issue or be used as a yardstick. Is it not a fact that the only reason why the gentleman and myself are here is because of that issue?

Mr. LAMNECK. No; I would not say that.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I yield nine minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the House, you will recall that a short time ago this House passed a resolution unanimously to create a commission to celebrate the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington. I rise to bring to the attention of the House to-day a little ancient history that may cause men in high places to reflect upon their solemn responsibilities as representatives of the people.

When, in 1793 it was sought by resolution in the House of Representatives to pay respect to President Washington on the occasion of his birthday the motion was vigorously opposed.

When the Jay-Grenville treaty of 1794 was placed in the hands of President Washington on March 7, 1795, the partisan press poured forth a perfect torrent of abuse. The Aurora, a newspaper of that period, had this to say:

> The President has violated the Constitution. He has made a treaty with a nation that is the abhorrence of our people. Louis XVI in the meridian of his splendor and his power never dared to heap such insults upon his subjects. The answers to the respectful remonstrances of Boston and Philadelphia and New York sound like the omnipotent director of a seraglio. * * * As he has been disrespectful to his people, let him no longer expect them to view him as a saint.

It was about this time a man who wrote under the name of "A Calm Observer" charged Washington with being a thief, alleging in support of the accusation that the Chief Executive had drawn from the Public Treasury for his private use more than the salary allowed by law, and inquired:

> What will posterity say of the man who has done this thing? Will it not say that the mask of political hypocrisy has been worn by Cæsar, by Cromwell, and by Washington alike?

How these poisoned shafts of calumny and gross ingratitude must have pierced the pure and stainless heart of Washington. How much he suffered from these assaults upon his character is a matter of recorded history.

One who styled himself "Pittachus" wrote:

> Happily the public mind is rapidly changing. Hitherto the name of Washington has been fatal to the popularity of every man against whom it was directed. Now it is as harmless as John O'Nooke or Tam O'Stiles. To be an opposer of the President will soon be a passport to popular favor.

At the very time when the life of the infant Republic hung by a thread and President Washington was quietly and courageously consecrating his very life to preserve and promote its welfare, he was subjected to an ever-increasing broadside of abuse. A writer of that time, referring to those who were then engaged in an effort to destroy public confidence in the Chief Executive, said that they—

> Threw aside all reserve * * * and under the abused name of the liberty of the press assaulted his fame with a virulence not inferior to that with which they could have attacked the meanest defaulter. His military, his civil, his political, his private domestic character were all arraigned, and he was asserted to be destitute of merit, either as a man or as a soldier. * * * Having once made the charge of peculation against Washington, the imposters stood their ground and undertook to support it by extracts said to be taken from the Treasury accounts. The Secretary of the Treasury testified that the appropriations made by the Legislature had never been exceeded, still the charge was repeated with an effrontery which passed with some for the firmness of conscious rectitude.

An extract published in the Aurora under the date of March 23, 1796, which is only one of many vicious assaults published at the time, will suffice to show the depths of degradation to which partisan prejudice can go in an attempt to blast the character of a political opponent:

> If ever a nation was debauched by a man, the American Nation has been debauched by Washington. If ever a nation has been deceived by a man, the American Nation has been deceived by Washington. Let his conduct, then, be an example to future ages; let it serve to be a warning that no man may be an idol; let the history of the Federal Government instruct mankind that the mask of patriotism may be worn to conceal the foulest designs against the liberty of the people.

Stung to the quick by these foul and merciless charges, Washington wrote to his friend, Governor Lee of Virginia, as follows:

> That there are in this, as in all other countries, discontented characters I well know, as also that these characters are actuated by very different views. Some good, from the opinion that the measures of the General Government are impure; some bad and (if I might be allowed to use so harsh an expression) diabolical, inasmuch as they are not only meant to impede the measures of government generally, but more especially to destroy the confidence which it is necessary the people should place (until they have unequivocal proof of demerit) in their servants; for in this light I consider myself whilst I am an occupant of office, and if they were to go further and call me their slave during this period, I will not dispute the point with them. But in what will this abuse terminate?

For the result, as it respects myself, I care not. I have a consolation within me of which no earthly efforts can deprive me, and that is, that neither ambition nor interested motives have influenced my conduct. The arrow of malevolence, however barbed and pointed, can never reach my most valuable part; though, whilst I am up as a mark, they will be continually aimed at me. The publications in Freneau's and Bache's papers are outrages on common decency, and they progress in that style, in proportion as their pieces are treated with contempt, and passed over in silence by those against whom they are directed. Their tendency, however, is too obvious to be mistaken by men of cool and dispassionate minds, and in my opinion ought to alarm them, because it is difficult to prescribe bounds to their effect.

That these outrageous and foul slanders injured and embittered President Washington is disclosed in a letter written by him to Thomas Jefferson:

To this I may add, and very truly, that until the last year or two I had no conception that parties would, or even could, go to the lengths I have been witness to; nor did I believe until lately it was within the bounds of probability—hardly within those of possibility—that while I was using my utmost exertions to establish a national character of our own, independent, as far as our obligations and justice would permit, of every nation of the earth, and wished by steering a steady course, to preserve this country from the horrors of a desolating war, I should be accused of being the enemy of our Nation and subject to the influence of another, and to prove it that every act of my administration would be tortured and the grossest and most insidious misrepresentations of them be made by giving one side only of a subject, and that, too, in such exaggerated and indecent terms as could scarcely be applied to a Nero, to a notorious defaulter, or even to a common pickpocket.

One of the most accomplished scoundrels of that period, a degenerate wretch named Callender, kept up an incessant assault upon Washington. Referring to the Farewell Address of Washington, in a pamphlet entitled "The Prospect Before Us," he said:

By his own account Mr. Washington was twice a traitor—he first renounced the King of England and thereafter the old confederation. His farewell paper contains a variety of mischievous sentiments.

Later this unconscionable knave turned his battery of abuse upon President Adams. He referred to him as a "hoary traitor."

It was alleged by the propagandists in the campaign of 1800 that Thomas Jefferson—

Had obtained his property by frauds and robbery; that in one instance he had defrauded and robbed a widow and fatherless children of an estate to which he was executor of £10,000 by keeping the property and paying them money at the nominal rate when it was worth more than 40 to 1.

This charge was promptly disproved.

Jefferson, in a letter to Washington, referring to the muck-raking newspapers of the time, said:

No government ought to be without censors, and where the press is free no one else ever will be.

Meeting a friend one day he remarked:

There is nothing true in the newspapers except the advertisements.

Not content to limit his attack to the public life of Jefferson, this arch renegade, Callender, charged him—

With having a family of negro children by a slave woman named Sally; with having been turned out of the house of a certain Major Walker for writing a secret love letter to his wife; and with having swindled his creditors by paying debts in worthless currency. * * *

As early as the year 1800 such charges were considered news, even when made against the author of the Declaration of Independence.

Andrew Jackson was called a murderer, an adulterer, and a traitor. The New York Evening Post, referring to him in its columns, said:

He has broken the known law of nations and promulgated a new code of his own, conceived in madness or folly, and written in blood. He has, in fine, violated all laws, human and divine.

Each day thousands of American citizens reverently stand before one of the most beautiful memorials in all the world to pay respect to the martyred Lincoln. Yet within the lives of men and women now living this great and good man was the target of the most vicious abuse and the grossest slander. A delegate at Chicago asserted that—

Ever since that usurper, traitor, and tyrant has occupied the presidential chair the party has shouted "War to the knife, and the knife to the hilt!" Blood has flowed in torrents, and yet the thirst of the old monster is not quenched. His cry is for more blood.

The assassin's bullet was the logical result of campaigns of falsehood and hate.

It would seem that the tragedies of Lincoln, Garfield, and McKinley might cause men in public life and the press to pause and reflect upon the possible consequences of inflammatory and false charges against the Chief Executive. There will always be some persons reckless enough to use their talents to manufacture and disseminate false and vicious charges against a President of the United States.

If any citizen of this country or any official of this Government has facts with which to prove corruption, let him use constitutional and legal machinery to correct the alleged abuse. Our Government is too precious to the individual and too essential to the preservation of civilization to be endangered by careless and reckless appeals to the prejudice and passions of suffering humanity. With radicals and reds appealing to the hungry and the unemployed urging disloyalty to the Government, this is no time for men in high places to start false rumors to achieve either personal or political advantage.

Mr. DAVIS. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES].

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise for the purpose of engaging in partisan debate or destructive criticism. Neither shall I consume the time of this House with glittering generalities and meaningless platitudes. We are in the midst of a great economic depression that is vitally affecting the happiness and well-being of countless millions of our fellow countrymen. It is not necessary to describe the deplorable conditions that obtain in every section of the Nation, and with which the majority of us on both sides are painfully familiar. The question that is paramount in every heart and upon every lip is the cause and the remedy. It is imperative that we discover the cause or causes in order that we may successfully and effectively apply the remedy or remedies.

I am not so presumptuous as to indulge the vain belief that I can point out the cause of our present situation and propose the necessary remedy. I have no panacea or political nostrum to offer. What I shall say is, like most statements, neither new nor original. But the repetition of great truths and the constant reminder of fundamental principles often serve to keep us on the true course, or, "when we wander from them in moments of error and alarm, to hasten us to retrace our steps and regain the road which alone leads to peace, liberty, and safety." Indeed, Mr. Chairman, there is nothing new underneath the sun. History repeats itself constantly, and in its accurate mirror we may often see familiar scenes and faces. Of the countless panaceas that flood the mail, few are either new or original.

Many decades before Karl Marx and Lenin were born the empty dream of communism was shattered in the ancient Republic of Sparta. The artificial fixation of prices by government and the vain attempt to suspend the operation of natural economic laws were unsuccessfully tried by the last Emperors of Rome. In spite of the lessons that history teaches and the light which she so generously offers to guide our erring steps, many of us prefer to grope in darkness or to try once again the futile experiments of the past.

Mr. Chairman, in my humble judgment the cause of the present economic crisis is our foolish attempt by artificial means to suspend or interfere with, in so far as certain favored groups and industries are concerned, the natural and orderly operation of those great and fundamental laws that underlie and govern the economic world. This attempt has been made by private monopoly, collusion on the part of competing industries, and by unsound legislation. We have sought to interfere with the laws of competition and the law of supply and demand by various and sundry artificial expedients. The adoption of an artificial expedient by one industry, or in favor of certain classes of industry and commerce, necessitates a similar course in reference to other industries until finally the barriers of artificial restraint impede the natural flow of commerce and business. The impounded rivers of industry and commerce will stagnate or eventually sweep away the artificial barriers and leave in their wake ruin and desolation. For a time these artificial barriers may be sufficient to suspend the operation of economic laws. During such time the favored and privileged classes that are protected by the artificial barriers enrich themselves at the expense of a helpless consuming public that is compelled to sell and work on a competitive basis and to buy in an artificially controlled market. This results in concentration of wealth and power in the hands of a few and the impoverishment of the many. It creates two extreme classes—the ultrarich and the ultrapoor.

In the last decade a new school of economic and political philosophy has risen from the tomb of the past. This school denounces competition in industry and commerce as wasteful, and advocates artificial control of supply and demand by private monopoly or collusive agreements. But, by a strange inconsistency, this school of thought does not apply its creed in the cases of independent business, agriculture, and labor. These latter groups are required to engage in the competitive struggle, and any attempt by legislation or otherwise to put them upon the same plane of economic equality with protected industries is met with vigorous opposition.

Spokesmen of large banks who are intimately associated with manufacturing and mining interests quickly perceive the mistake of impoverished agricultural producers in following, with the aid of the Government, the example of the big industries in artificial control of prices. The farmers are told that it is futile to undertake to solve the problem of farm surpluses by keeping prices up and stimulating greater surpluses. These same spokesmen admonish the farmers that all attempts to suspend the operation of the law of supply and demand will result in failure. But there is no difference in theory and policy between industrial and agricultural price control " in defiance of the law of supply and demand," as the phrase goes. The real difference in practice is that large private business is usually able to do it for a time more successfully and to the greater profit of the little group of insiders, than can any governmental board for the benefit of a multitude of individual and competitive citizens. By a well-directed and organized propaganda the faults and failures of the Sherman antitrust law have been pounded in our ears. Some captains of industry are urging us to make radical revision of its terms—if not to bring about its complete repeal. During the past decade this economic school which holds as its chief tenet the proposition that competition in industry and commerce should be eliminated has largely shaped and directed the policies of our Government. By a prohibitive tariff policy we have practically freed privileged and favored industries from every character of foreign competition.

The object of our tariff legislation has been not to regulate competition or protect American industry from dumping, retaliation, or unfair competition. In our zeal to protect the favored industries we have gone so far as to free them from every character of foreign competition, fair and unfair alike. The Government has not sought by its tariff policy to raise revenue, protect infant industries, or to protect efficient and important industries from destructive competition based on lower standards of living and labor costs abroad. There was a time when our country was largely dependent on mining and agriculture and we had the very natural desire for industrial development. We recognized that the unrestricted competition of well-established industrial countries would seriously retard our industrial progress. In order to " promote the stability of our economic life by broadening the base of our prosperity it was felt that it was justifiable for the Nation to incur the temporary economic loss on account of the higher prices paid for protected commodities." Our industries are no longer infants, but have reached the state of maturity.

It is said that because many industries in foreign nations pay lower wages than are paid in the United States we are justified and even compelled to protect our own producers so that they can in turn protect their employees from the unfair competition of such foreign producers. Of course, no intelligent citizen wants the standards of American living to be lowered or the American laborer to be reduced to a state of semislavery, but there is a vast distinction between wages and labor costs. Many industries in the United States pay considerably higher wages than are paid by their competitors in foreign countries and yet the actual labor cost of the home producer is considerably less than that of his foreign rival. The American laborer, with his intelligence, efficiency, and superior equipment, is able to create considerably more wealth than the laborers of other countries; and it is a truth demonstrated so often that it is now generally accepted that our workmen, receiving higher wages in comparison with those of other countries, have such a high rate of production that the cost per unit of output is much lower than that of low-paid labor in foreign countries, which is inefficient and wastefully used.

But in spite of the greater productive capacity of the American laborer, the more fertile resources of our country and the more highly improved machinery and technique, many of our industries demand and receive prohibitive tariff protection to avoid every character of competition, fair and unfair alike.

But not content with the elimination of foreign competition the high priests of this school of economic philosophy, that seems to direct the policy of our administration, advocate the elimination or restriction of competition between industries in the United States. This is sought to be accomplished by the artificial means of collusion and agreements between competitors; or by consolidation of several concerns either by merger or acquisition. But a change has taken place in the methods by which great combines seek to artificially suspend the operation of the law of competition and supply and demand. They no longer resort to price cutting to eliminate competition. Prices are maintained at a level which allows the larger and more efficient units in the industry to earn large surpluses, " concealed by the secrecy with which many of the price arrangements are conducted and by the continued existence in some instances of a number of small independent businesses which follow the trust prices and furnish protective coloring." The great combines say they desire to stabilize the market and not to spoil it. The smaller competing concerns fear the potential ability of the more powerful combines to undersell drastically the less powerful. Therefore, by informal gentlemen's agreements and understandings, or by tacit understanding, or by the dominant leadership of the great combines, prices are in a number of industries maintained at an artificial level. The other method by which artificial control of prices and interference with natural economic laws are maintained is by consolidation of several concerns either by merger or acquisition.

Mergers have been rapidly multiplying.

Between 1918 and 1928, 1,268 resulting consolidations involving billions of dollars of capital were formed, an average of 127 a year. In this process of consolidation many thousands of originally independent establishments disappeared, " narrowing in all directions the field of competition, and enlarging the domain of private monopoly."

Some of these combinations are formed for the purpose of securing the economies of large-scale operation. The economies which large-scale operation may offer are well known.

In the purchase in bulk of raw material and power there is opportunity for comparison and selection which is denied to small rivals. In production there is an opportunity to profit by division of labor; each person employed can be given his own job to do; there need be no waste of time or skill in standing idle or transferring from one kind of work to another; the manufacturing plant can be worked to capacity and every machine, like every worker, can be given a particular task to perform so that the product can be turned out with accuracy and precision; by-products can be utilized and wastes may be disposed of profitably in bulk; products can be standardized. In marketing, the large-scale producer has the opportunity to profit by the cheapness of transporting in bulk and may often maintain his own services by road, rail, or water. In advertising, the large-scale producer has the opportunity to maintain his selling force considerably less costly per unit of products sold than the smaller firms and in distributing he may maintain his own wholesale and retail selling agencies and thereby earn for himself the profits which formerly went to the middleman.

Although the economies of large-scale production are the objects sometimes sought by consolidation, in many instances this is used as a mere pretext. In some instances great consolidations are not as efficient as independent units; the smaller unit can often achieve economies which are denied to the large-scale producer.

A study in 1921 of the most notable mergers formed before 1903 showed that in 23 of the 35 cases the earnings in the next 10 years were less than before the merger, and in half of these less than one-third to nine-tenths, and in the aggregate earnings of all 35 were nearly one-fifth less than those of the separate competing establishments prior to consolidation. Even the United States Steel Corporation earned only about 85 per cent as much in its first 10 years as the previous earnings of its constituent companies. The great consolidations often become unwieldy organizations, and the effective supervision and the higher direction of the enterprise become impossible. But when the consolidation is once formed it is usually impossible to unscramble it. The efficiency of the resulting merger may be less than that of the units which make it up, when the latter were separate and independent; but its ability to artificially control the market, the hesitancy of new capital to enter an already overcrowded industry, the tremendous influence of the financial interests closely linked with the combine may serve to keep it alive long after industrial justification for its existence has ceased.

Many mergers are formed because promoters see the opportunity to make a fortune through overcapitalization and the issuance and sale of watered stock. The syndicate that formed the United States Steel Corporation made a profit of $62,500,000; of this the firm of J. Pierpont Morgan received $12,500,000, in addition to the share of which they were entitled as syndicate members. The formation of the Asphalt Co. of America left in the hands of promoting interests about one-third of the total bonds issued in acquisition of the various constituent properties.

Professor Dewing, who examined in detail the promotion and financial history of 14 of the largest American combines, concluded that in their promotion the total tangible assets averaged 40 per cent of the total issued securities; the remaining 60 per cent represented watered stock. Some one must pay for these watered stocks—either the owners, in the eventual deflation of the market value of the stocks or in lower dividends, or the consumer who must pay artificially maintained prices for the commodities, or the workmen and employees who must accept lower wages than they would otherwise be entitled to.

But even where the merger succeeds for a time in maintaining par value of its watered stock by artificially controlling the prices of its products, or by paying lower wages, eventually the economic law will reassert itself, the water will be squeezed out of the stock, and millions of dollars will be wiped out. The stock-market crash in 1929 illustrates the force of this statement. The unfortunate situation is that those who were responsible for the inflation will not have to bear the losses of the deflation. The bill must be paid by a helpless, investing, and consuming public. Some consolidations are formed to eliminate cutthroat competition and potential competition. In industries where overhead costs are high and where business is carried on under conditions of rapidly diminishing returns, unfair prices may force the cost of competition below the cost of production. Mergers are also formed to prevent a potential competition which is not yet developed.

The Eastman Kodak Co. and the United Shoe Machinery Co. owe their dominant position mainly to the purchase of patents which they did not intend to use, but which they feared might be used against them. The General Motors Co. of New Jersey bought control of 10 companies making motors and accessories to prevent the development of competition.

Many combinations of business units on the same plane of production under a central control are often formed to obtain a monopoly position. They desire to be able to dictate to both supplier of raw materials and consumer of finished products; such combines are wasteful because they usually buy up inefficient and badly located plants, which are either closed down or maintained at a loss which must be made up by higher prices or lower wages or dividends.

Consolidation has resulted in the concentration of wealth and power in the hands of a few. Eight automobile companies account for 90.9 per cent of the value of that output. Ownership is in many instances divorced from management. The control of a business is often in the hands of a minority holding. If 90 per cent of the securities owned by 30,000 individual investors, none of whom has a holding of more than, say, 1 per cent, an individual owning 10 per cent of the securities can obtain effective control.

The diffusion of joint-stock ownership gives the opportunity for concentration of financial control. This accounts for the fact that a few great financial barons are able, through ownership of a minority holding in various consolidations, to control a large per cent of the wealth and industrial concerns in the United States. These great barons of finance have formed certain industrial blocs where interests are so grouped that they come within the control of one or a few single personalities. These groups or concerns often form an international network.

Therefore, privileged and favored industries and classes have freed themselves from the competitive struggle. The majority of our citizenship, the small firm or corporation, the single manufacturer, the millions of farmers and laboring people, the small merchants, the multitude of individual citizens are still subject to the laws and conditions of competition in the sale of their goods and services. Lincoln said, "A nation half slave and half free can not endure." Neither can a democracy endure whose economic organization is monopolistic for the few and competitive for the masses. The farmer must not only compete with millions of other farmers in the production and sale of his products but, in many instances, he is compelled to compete with the cheap pauper labor of India and Egypt. The laborer is not only compelled to compete with millions of other laborers in the sale of his services but he is also compelled to compete with the thousands of foreigners that are illegally in this country and the ones that come during normal times in a constant stream from Mexico and Canada.

The independent merchant is compelled to compete with thousands of other independent merchants in the sale of his wares. All of these groups are subject to the laws of competition and supply and demand in the sale of their products or services, but when they come to buy the necessities which they require they are compelled to buy in an artificially controlled market and to pay artificially maintained and fixed prices.

Those from whom they buy are protected from foreign competition by a prohibitive tariff and from domestic competition by collusions, agreements, and consolidations. Not only can the privileged classes that are protected by these artificial barriers eliminate with competition but they can also interfere with the law of supply and demand by short selling on the stock market. These favored groups can sell stocks, securities, and products which they do not possess, and in this manner reduce the demand and lower prices to the detriment of the producer. On the other hand, they can purchase stocks, securities, and products from those who do not own them for the purpose of creating an abnormal demand which will artificially raise prices, to the injury of the ultimate consumer.

The next question which presents itself for solution is what remedies must be prescribed to cure these evils. It is apparent that we must either destroy the artificial barriers that have protected a few at the expense of the many or we must undertake to so widen them as to include those now excluded. If it is right for favored groups to eliminate with competition, then it is right for all groups to do likewise. If we must have a protective tariff, then the farmers, laborers, and independent business men must be given the benefit of it, and it must be made to function for them. If favored groups are to be permitted to eliminate with or control domestic competition in the United States, then the farmers and the laboring people must be permitted, through governmental aid, to control the prices of their products and services. When the benefit of artificial restraint and control of prices, production, and output is extended to all classes we will all sink or swim together. The real remedy lies in the destruction of the artificial barriers that have been created by special interests. If certain groups must be subjected to the laws of competition and supply and demand, then all groups must be subjected to these laws, and all classes must be placed on the same plane of economic equality so that none can profit at the expense of the others.

The evil effects of the artificial elimination or restriction of foreign and domestic competition in industry and commerce and the suspension of the law of supply and demand in so far as certain favored industries are concerned can now be readily seen. The ruthless exclusion of all foreign competition, fair and unfair alike, has provoked retaliatory measures on the part of foreign countries. We suddenly find ourselves boycotted commercially, the markets of the world closed to us, our export trade, so essential to large-scale operations where mass production necessitates mass consumption, vanished overnight. Our factories and industries begin to desert us and to locate within the tariff walls of other nations. This has transferred billions of dollars of working capital from our Nation to build up the trade and industry of foreign countries. The elimination of foreign and domestic competition by artificial means has produced large surpluses. "Wasteful surplus productive capacity has appeared most strikingly in the industries where either private conspiracy or mischievous governmental favoritism has offended against economic laws." It has been the contention of economists since the days of Adam Smith that true competition is the only workable method by which equality of opportunity can be preserved, prices maintained at a fair level, and the economic balance of all groups in the Nation maintained. No one has ever attempted to defend cutthroat competition, which is an evil that often lowers wages and the standards of living and was commonly employed in the early days of the trusts as a method of crushing independent competitors. The new school of economic philosophy seeks to discredit the value of true competition by asserting that competition is no longer suitable for our advanced industrial civilization and the machine age. There are only three alternatives for true competition, and they are either private monopoly, government regulation, or government ownership. Private monopoly is contrary to the genius of our free institutions and can never flourish in an atmosphere of liberty and equal opportunities. Government ownership is undesirable, because it will result in the destruction of private initiative, individual ambition, and personal incentive.

Government regulation of all industries and businesses affected with a public interest is imperative to protect the consumer and the laborer. Under the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States many large-scale businesses can not be regulated because the courts have declined to construe them as being affected with a public interest. In the large-scale operations, the only method by which the purchasing power of the Nation can be maintained so that mass consumption can make possible mass production is to pass the economies of large-scale production on to the majority of the consuming public either by lower prices, higher wages, greater dividends, or shorter hours of work. In order that the economic balance may be maintained, these economies must be distributed in fair and just proportions to the principal groups (of commerce), the stockholders, the laborers, and the consuming public involved.

Consolidations that have no economic justification for their existence or that were formed for the purpose of artificially controlling prices should be vigorously prosecuted under the terms of the Sherman antitrust law and the Clayton Act. But we must bear in mind that, under Supreme Court decisions, size and large-scale operations do not mean monopoly. If the laws now in existence are unable to deal effectively with unsound consolidations we should strengthen the law by explicitly, and item by item, forbidding the actual processes and methods of monopolies. Not only should we do that but we should also pass adequate legislation to prevent cutthroat competition which often produces monopolies. We should undertake to maintain a system of fair competition in markets where the law of supply and demand is permitted to operate, with restrictions against the waste of natural resources which are essential to the welfare of the Nation and the future happiness of posterity. Fair competition tends to decrease overproduction and surplus because in a true market, not dominated by private monopoly or governmental fixation of prices, when the supply becomes too great for the demand, the demand slackens, prices decrease, and these, in turn, furnish a safe check to slow up production.

On the other hand, when the supply is not sufficient for the market, the demand increases, prices go up, and this in turn stimulates production to the point needed. But in markets where prices of commodities are artificially maintained by agreements between competitors or by combinations in restraint of trade, there is no means by which the producer can determine when his production is excessive in time to avoid the creation of a great surplus. Consequently, where there is no competition, there are times when the productive capacity of industry is increased beyond all proportion to the purchasing power of the consumer.

Another evil effect of the artificial elimination or restriction of true competition is that for a decade a fictitious and unreal value of the watered stock of consolidations was maintained by artificial control of prices above a reasonable level. The public was induced to invest savings in these watered stocks and securities. In order to stimulate the market quotations of these stocks, various artificial expedients were resorted to, such as short selling, control of prices either by collusion, tacit agreements, leadership of a dominant industry, or constant injection of new water into the stocks through issuance of bonus stocks without due regard to the real value of the physical assets of the consolidation. Finally, the natural economic laws reasserted themselves, and in the twinkle of an eye the bubble was pricked. This inflation of stock values was largely stimulated by the exaggerted prosperity talk of the Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover administrations and by the encouragement of the Federal Reserve Board. The deflation was precipitated by the sudden change of policy on the part of the reserve board in suddenly throwing on the financial brakes and thereby accelerating and aggravating the contraction of credit and the return to true values. This extreme action not only served to squeeze the water out of stocks but depreciated the value of good securities beyond all reason or economic justification. The unfortunate result of this was that the masses of the people sustained the losses and a small group of insiders were enabled to increase their swollen fortunes. An analysis of the income-tax returns for 1928 and 1929 indicates that the speculative turnover, or sales of real estate, stocks, and bonds held less than two years, was comparatively small, while the sales of assets held more than two years set a high record.

Individuals in the higher income brackets evidently anticipated the crash and took advantage of the good market during 1928 and 1929, and disposed of a good proportion of their assets held more than two years, according to the statement of the Wall Street Journal issued on April 16, 1931. This unloading of watered stocks at a tremendous figure by insiders evidently accounts for the fact that during 1929, 511 persons filed income-tax returns showing an income of more than $1,000,000 each.

The elimination or restriction of competition in favor of certain favored industries and the artificial control of the law of supply and demand by consolidations, agreements, and the manipulation of the stock exchange by speculators have greatly increased the concentration of wealth and power in the hands of a few. The incomes of super-rich have been multiplied by 15 in the last 10 years, while the incomes of skilled workers, small business men, and young professional men have been almost cut in two. This is creating two extreme classes in the United States—the ultra-rich and ultrapoor—and is destroying the middle class that has always formed the backbone of our civilization and society. In times of prosperity, the great combines and the financial magnates are able to reap a bountiful harvest through their artificial control of prices, and in times of inevitable reaction produced by defiance of economic truths this privileged class is able to throw the losses of instability back upon the producers from whom they buy or forward upon the consumer to whom they sell. In some industries, if the power to make the market is exercised through combinations, price fluctuations which are ruinous to producers may be, with a fair degree of regularity, turned into profits for those in control.

The problems that now confront us are as follows:

First. Preserve true competition in real markets and prevent unfair practices and cutthroat competition.

Second. In industries where competition is nonexistent or ineffective, such as exists in public utilities, to bring about effective governmental regulation that will protect labor from unfair wages and the consuming public from discrimination and unreasonable rates, and the investing public from watered stock, and at the same time allow sufficient room for the fair play of private initiative and individual ambition.

Third. Prevent mergers and consolidation where same are economically unsound and unjustified industrially or where the consolidation results in a monopoly.

Fourth. We must be careful not to discourage or penalize legitimate business and industry; an unwise policy toward business and industry will tend to increase unemployment and aggravate the depression. We must not penalize men who, instead of hoarding their wealth or investing it in nontaxable securities and bonds, put their money to work in business and industry which give employment to millions of citizens and increases the general wealth and prosperity of the Nation. There are many business men in this country and many industrial leaders that exhibit the highest form of patriotism and social responsibility by conducting necessary enterprises that furnish employment to millions of citizens at good wages, reasonable hours, and with conditions of work that are unparalleled in the history of industry. They have made possible the production and distribution of a maximum of luxuries and necessities at a minimum price. They represent a natural evolution in the world of industry and business and neither laws nor unwise policies can retard this industrial progress. When we penalize working capital by unreasonable taxation, we discourage legitimate business and cause it to enter the avenues of speculation, or we encourage it to seek nontaxable investments. We must apply the Jeffersonian principles of equal and exact justice to all classes and groups in our economic life. To capital, business, labor, and agriculture we must preserve the opportunity for a fair return upon labor, capital, investment, brains, energy, and thrift. But we must at all times bear in mind that mass production necessitates mass consumption, that mass consumption is only possible where the purchasing power of the consuming public is maintained and where our export trade is not destroyed by prohibitive tariff legislation. The purchasing power of the consuming public can only be maintained where the economies of large-scale operation are distributed in fair proportions to capital, labor, and agriculture.

Fifth. The regulation of our stock exchange and banking system to prevent gambling and wild speculation and the sale of watered stock and worthless foreign securities and bonds to the investing public. It is impossible to estimate the millions of dollars of watered stock of some American corporations and combines that have been unloaded on the investing public. The international bankers have unloaded on the private investors of America billions of dollars of worthless securities and bonds. Between 1914 and 1930 the American public invested about fifteen billions in foreign loans. In many instances those foreign securities and bonds have depreciated 90 per cent. In many instances banks have invested the funds of depositors in these worthless securities. It is difficult to estimate the loss that will be sustained by the American people, but it will probably run into millions of dollars. It is not right for speculators to depress prices of stocks, bonds, securities, and agricultural products by short selling, and by dishonest manipulation. This can and must be prevented in the interest of all the people and the future stability of our economic life.

Sixth. The prohibition of immigration from every country for a period of five years and the deportation of aliens that are illegally in the United States. Those that are here should be given a limited time in which to become naturalized. Even President Hoover, in his message to Congress, urges that the administrative restriction of immigration, which has resulted during the past year in the decrease of quota immigrants, should be put upon some permanent basis. There is no justification for immigration to the United States, and the only way to avoid discrimination as to nationalities and races and the resulting misunderstandings and ill feelings is to prevent all immigration for a period of five years.

Seventh. The appropriation of sufficient money to inaugurate immediately needed public improvements and construction. We are in need of many Federal buildings and, in fact, are paying excessive rents in a number of large cities. Many of our towns, such as, for example, Lufkin and Rusk, Tex., are in great need of Federal buildings. Many waterways, such as the Sabine-Neches waterways, urgently need deepening and widening, and other improvements. Many Federal highways, such as the Hug-the-Coast Highway and the highway from Beaumont and Orange, Tex., to New Boston through Kirbyville, Jasper, San Augustine, and Center, urgently need improvements, and at the present rate of public improvements it will take us a century to complete the projects already outlined and adopted. There never was a more favorable time to carry forward and stimulate public improvements than now. A well-directed, efficient, and well-organized program, vigorously carried out, will give employment to millions of our citizens, put millions of dollars in circulation, and assist materially in the restoration of public confidence. The money will not be wasted, but will be invested in projects that will repay the Nation many times.

Eighth. The revision of the tariff so as to restore our world trade without permitting foreign nations to dump the products of convict or cheap, pauper labor upon our markets to the destruction of American labor and industry. The tariff must be made to function for agriculture the same as it does for big business. This can be accomplished by lifting the tariff in favor of farmers who have an exportable surplus, such as the cotton, wheat, and corn farmers, or by giving to such farmers export debentures so as to give them the same benefits as are derived by privileged classes.

Ninth. The reorganization of our Federal bureaus and departments in order to eliminate duplication and overlapping and extravagant operations. The burdens of taxation must be lifted from the shoulders of farmers and small home owners and transferred to the groups and classes that make large incomes and profits. Government must be operated on a more economical basis. Unjust taxation is destroying agriculture and legitimate business.

Now, Mr. Chairman, permit me to say that there are other measures that can be adopted that will bring relief to the millions of our fellow countrymen that are in great distress. I suggest these as the most important, and I trust that this Congress will subordinate every other consideration to the paramount question of relieving the distress and suffering that exist in every section of our Nation.

The Republican Party has sowed the wind and now it is reaping the whirlwind. [Applause.] It has taken from the farmers and wage earners of this country the fruits of their toil in tariff and taxes to increase the already swollen fortunes of favored and privileged classes. It has allowed great combinations of wealth, through foreign chain enterprises, to destroy independent business and fill their own pockets at the expense of a helpless consuming public. You gentlemen on the Republican side may laugh now at what I am saying, but it will not be so funny to you after the next election. [Applause.]

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, permit me to say that as I stand here this afternoon in this historic Chamber and before the greatest legislative body in the world, I am reminded of one now gone, whose voice is still, whose lips are mute, and whose soul has long since flown to the great beyond. The presence of many of his loyal and devoted friends in this hall evokes the memory of his life, and though I know his body is moldering in the silent dust, yet it seems to me that his spirit pervades this Capitol, where he labored for many years for the interests of his people and during one of the greatest crises that ever confronted this Nation. My father was a true son of east Texas. Brave and courageous, he "never bent the pregnant hinges of his knee that thrift might follow fawning."

Kind and gentle, he was always tolerant of the faults and frailties of mankind. By his brave and courageous public service, by his fearless expressions of convictions, by his unfailing loyalty and devotion to his friends, and by the profound love that he had for his country he left the world better than he found it. Because he thought that he was right, he took issues with a Democratic President at a time when public feelings were worked to the highest pitch, and when it meant political suicide. But the people had an abiding faith in the rugged honesty of his character and convictions, and he was returned to Congress by a substantial majority. He had a profound respect and love for this great legislative body, and he believed that it was the bulwark of the people's liberty and the safeguard of their rights. He would never tolerate unjust and careless criticism of the Congress of the United States; and whenever it was attacked, he was always ready to break a lance in its behalf.

Mr. Chairman, I do not know how long I shall be permitted to serve in this great body, but whether my service be long or short, distinguished or obscure, it is my fervent hope and sincere wish that I, like my father, may earn the esteem, friendship, and love of the membership of this House. A great opportunity lies before the democracy of this Nation. A great patriot and a brilliant Democrat occupies the Speaker's chair. Our chairmanships and floor leadership are filled by men of outstanding ability and unquestioned integrity. Under their leaderships we will yet achieve a long-needed victory for the masses of the American citizenship. [Applause.]

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, in the diatribe delivered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania the day before yesterday, certain statements appear which can not go unchallenged. The gentleman in question attacked Mr. Paul M. Warburg, distinguished publicist and banker of New York, one of the so-called "fathers" of the present Federal reserve system. The gentleman from Pennsylvania sought to besmear and besmirch his reputation by making the absurd charge that he was responsible for the present depression and that he is the recipient of the greatest profits as a result of the losses of the farmers and wage earners of the country.

Warburg needs no defense. His record is unassailable. It is a record of fine patriotic service. It was he who sounded the warning tocsin, and long before, of the coming of the stock-market debacle, admonished the banks and the Federal Reserve Board at Washington that unless credit were restrained and speculation stopped the worst would befall. His warning was like a cry in the wilderness. His prophecy, which was unerring in its accuracy amidst all the fake predictions of prosperity "just around the corner," fell upon deaf ears.

Walter Lippman, whose incisive and penetrating articles have often enlightened me and many other Members of this House, writing in this morning's Herald Tribune, makes some cogent and pertinent remarks concerning the gentleman from Pennsylvania and Mr. Paul M. Warburg, which I herewith insert in the RECORD:

With such an attack as that delivered by Congressman MCFADDEN, of Pennsylvania, the President has no need to concern himself. Mr. MCFADDEN has long since earned the contempt of honest men, and his speech on Tuesday, charging Mr. Hoover with having plotted with Germany's bankers to betray the country, is such obvious indecency that it requires no answer. All that needs to be done with the speech is to expunge it from the RECORD, which it would otherwise defile. It is not possible, I believe, under the Constitution to expunge Mr. MCFADDEN.

There was, however, a passage in the speech which does call for brief comment, for it is an attack on a private individual who, unlike the President, can not count upon the instant revulsion of the country against Mr. MCFADDEN's libels. I refer to Mr. Paul M. Warburg, who is described in the speech as "the man who engineered the great depression, the man who is the chief beneficiary of the losses sustained by the farmers and the wage earners of this country."

This is a demonstrable falsehood. Far from being the man who "engineered" the great depression, Mr. Warburg has the conspicuous distinction of having warned the country publicly, specifically, and accurately about the impending disaster. He did so on March 7, 1929, seven months before the panic, at the time when the Federal Reserve Bank of New York was vainly endeavoring to pursuade Washington to let it put the brakes upon the speculative mania. There is not space here to quote the whole of Mr. Warburg's remarks, but in justice to a man who was a true, a timely, and courageous prophet, these few sentences are worth remembering:

"If a stock-exchange debauch is quickly arrested by prompt and determined action, it is not too much to hope that a shrinkage of inflated stock prices may be brought about without seriously affecting the wider circle of general business. If orgies of unrestrained speculation are permitted to spread too far, however, the ultimate collapse is certain not only to affect the speculators themselves but also to bring about a general depression involving the entire country . . . hesitation in taking effectual means to reassert the Federal reserve system's leadership places a grave responsibility on those in charge of its administration."

Mr. Warburg can stand on his record. It does him honor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

(b) The term "person" means an individual, partnership, corporation, or association.

(c) The term "owner" means the person holding legal title to a motor vehicle, except that in case any motor vehicle is the subject of a conditional sale or mortgage, the conditional vendee or mortgagor of such motor vehicle, having in such case the right to immediate possession of such motor vehicle, shall be deemed the owner.

(d) The term "director" means the director of vehicles and traffic of the District of Columbia.

(e) The term "dealer" means any person engaged in the business of manufacturing, distributing, or dealing in motor vehicles.

(g) The term "trailer" means a vehicle without motive power designed (1) for carrying property or persons wholly on its own structure and (2) for being drawn by a motor vehicle.

(h) The term "semitrailer" means a vehicle of the trailer type so designed and used in conjunction with a motor vehicle that some part of its own weight and that of its own load rests upon or is carried by a motor vehicle.

(i) The term "farm tractor" means a motor vehicle designed and used primarily for drawing implements of agricultural husbandry.

(j) The term "motor cycle" means a motor vehicle of bicycle or tricycle type, except a trailer or semitrailer.

(o) The term "interstate commerce" means commerce between any place in a State or the District of Columbia and any place outside thereof; or between points within the same State or the District of Columbia, but through any place outside thereof.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In view of the questions that I asked the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] I want to make some observations indicating my notions about this matter.

First, however, I want to commend the select committee on fiscal relations for the work they have accomplished. Certainly it is disappointing, I am sure, not only to them but to Members of the House generally to realize that after diligent study and work accomplished much abuse is heaped upon them by the press of the District of Columbia. I think the job they have done is a mighty fine job. They have collected much information. They have devoted a great deal of time and attention to their study, and they are entitled to the thanks of all their colleagues as well as of the country.

I have felt that three of the bills they have suggested and reported are along the right lines, including the gasoline-tax legislation.

As I understand it, the purpose of this committee has not been so much to impose more general taxes on the District of Columbia or anything of that nature but rather to distribute the taxes in a more equitable and fair manner. So two of the bills that have already been passed are based purely upon the fundamental principle of ability to pay. I refer, of course, to the income-tax bill and the inheritance-tax bill, the enactment of which will do away with the very unsatisfactory method in vogue heretofore of assessing intangibles. I think that plan has the general approval of everyone.

The gasoline-tax bill provides a method by which the user of an automobile pays a tax in proportion to the use he makes of the streets. That appeals, I think, fundamentally to the fairness of every individual; but I regret that when it comes to this last bill I at least can not find the same element of fairness and justice. I do not find in it the same degree of trying to base the tax upon the ability to pay or upon people who are not already assessed sufficiently as is the case with the other three measures. That is why I am not entirely satisfied with it. I concede this bill also has some very good provisions.

Now, what does this bill do? It wipes out the present taxation laws of the District against automobiles. I do not know how badly that law has been abused. I presume it has been abused to some extent, as is the case with every tax law. I note from the report, however, that some 126,000 cars have been assessed, and on the average the tax amounted to something like $4.75 per car. I think there are some 30,000 cars that have paid only a tax of $1 plus a $1 regulation fee, due to a very low value. At any rate, it is true, under the law as it now exists, the theory is that all automobiles are taxed upon their value, the same theory under which general taxation is applied; and the theory has been that this $1 regulatory fee would simply regulate the use of the automobiles. It is a license fee, and not a tax.

Now, what is proposed here. The proposal is to do away with both, and the bill that is offered is one where the report admits, and the debate here to-day admits, that it is tax based upon one element and one element alone, namely, weight of the car.

As the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GLOVER] suggested in the colloquy a little while ago, following what I suggested in a question I asked the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS], there may be serious question as to the constitutionality of that sort of provision. I had not seen the bill when the debate started. Copies were not available until after the debate started. So, of course, I have had no opportunity to examine the decisions; but in applying what seems to be fundamental principles of law with reference to taxation, when you come out boldly but fairly and say that this is a tax, and then take into consideration only weight in determining the amount of such tax, then at least you have a question that is likely to get into the courts.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Dakota?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURTNESS. But I am not so much concerned about that. Let us consider the fairness of it, or lack thereof, to the owners of cars.

As was suggested in the colloquy here a little while ago by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], some of these automobiles of more or less ancient vintage, cars seven or eight years old, are heavier than the automobiles purchased generally now. There are many clerks and employees of the Government here who have been able to buy an automobile. Some of them bought them years ago, and some of these employees have now retired and have only their retirement pay, but they are happy to brush up that old car and take it out on the streets and run it. They may run them only 1,000 or 2,000 miles during a season. They are scarcely fit for long trips. The car is not worth a nickel more in actual value than they could get for it as junk, and yet it gives them a good deal of pleasure to have it and to use it. Under this bill that you are proposing now that kind of a car, practically worthless for sale, will pay some $15 or $20 of tax, and will pay practically the same amount of tax as an individual who goes down and buys a new Lincoln, for the weight of some of these cars is pretty nearly the same as the weight of a Lincoln. I am not speaking with exact nicety, but at least I am trying to point out the unfair discrepancy in the situation.

It is all right as a regulatory matter to base a fee solely upon weight. It is a proper consideration for regulation; but it is not, I submit, a proper consideration for an assessment or for a tax on something that is supposed to represent, or at least have some sort of connection with, the individual's ability to pay or the individual's use of income-producing property, or something of that sort.

I hear they say, "Oh, this is a modern tendency." That may be. Neither have I had time during the last few minutes to look up the statutes of the various States. I do know, however, that this sort of bill could not be enacted in the legislature of my own State. It would not appeal to our people.

In North Dakota we have tried to treat the owners fairly. We have taken a combination of three factors—the factory price, horsepower, and weight. Those are all given consideration; a combination of three determines the total tax, including regulation. After the first year it is reduced 10 per cent, the following year there is a further reduction of 10 per cent, and so on each year until the reduction amounts to 50 per cent, as I recall it; and then no matter how long the car is used that remains as the tax. In this way value is given due consideration. There is another factor which we must take into account when we compare this bill with the laws of States. The reason why an automobile tax is so large in the various States, generally, both with reference to the gasoline tax and the regulatory fees, is because of the desire to establish a system of rural routes throughout the States. That is why the owners of the property have stood for comparatively high rates. They have wanted to build up a system of public roads. But that does not apply in the District of Columbia. I think that is a factor to be taken into consideration.

I approve of the gasoline tax, because the owners of cars pay in proportion to the use they make of the roads and streets. We use that to build up and maintain the streets and highways.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTNESS. Yes.

Mr. PERKINS. You admit that the use is a factor in determining the facts?

Mr. BURTNESS. Yes.

Mr. PERKINS. Does not the man who drives a car weighing 10,000 pounds make more use of the road than one who drives one weighing 2,000 pounds?

Mr. BURTNESS. As a regulatory factor I say that weight is a proper factor to take into consideration. This is especially true with trucks. I also contend that a man who drives a car that weighs 8,000 or 9,000 pounds a thousand miles does not use the road any more than one who drives a car of 5,000 pounds 10,000 miles. All factors should be given the consideration which each fairly deserves.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. There are only two States, so far as appears in the statement of the National Automobile Chamber of Commerce, where the question of value occurs directly. In Iowa, it is the value and net weight. In Minnesota, the value; and in North Dakota, the factory price, net weight, horsepower, and age graduated. I presume that is what the gentleman from North Dakota referred to as the decrease in valuation.

Mr. BURTNESS. Yes; largely.

Mr. FREAR. All the rest of the States have the same method of taxation which we have endeavored to put in this bill before us. You would have to change over the whole structure of the bill, so far as the weight would be concerned, unless the gentleman has another plan, and should move to strike out section 7, which has to do with the express personal-property tax, which has not been successful here. It is difficult to see how we could pursue the course he suggests.

Mr. BURTNESS. The gentleman does not mean to imply that there are many States that place the entire assessment on a weight basis alone?

Mr. FREAR. Oh, there may be personal property taxation, but the National Chamber of Commerce has issued this statement as to the fees in the different States. If anyone shall offer an amendment, we will consider it, but we would find it difficult to reach the situation that is expressed here by the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. BURTNESS. I hope the gentleman does not understand me to say that weight is not a proper factor for regulation, but there ought to be some proper consideration when it comes to determine the amount of tax assessed to the value of the car.

Mr. FREAR. I understand that. But you would have to change all this, or otherwise the tax would be too high.

Mr. BURTNESS. That is true. May I suggest an amendment? What does the gentleman think of retaining the personal-property tax—striking out section 7, so there would be a tax on the value, and then cut down the regulation fee based on weight very substantially—say, make it 10 or 20 cents on each hundred pounds of weight instead of 50 cents on passenger cars?

Mr. FREAR. We have not given consideration to that. The committee has endeavored to draft a bill which will be an example to the various States. We are all in sympathy with the man who has a small and poor car, but there is no legislation but that will have some injustice. Even the man who makes the assessment may not assess it properly. All those questions come in; but it would seem to me that unless something better be offered to the House, this is the best sort of tax that can be levied. I am in sympathy with the purpose the gentleman has in mind, but I do not see how he will accomplish it without an entire change in the policy of weight taxation to meet wear of pavements—a usual consideration.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. The gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURTNESS] has certain ideas that perhaps are based somewhat on the law in his own State, but the law in his own State with respect to this subject is different from the law in all the other 47 States. North Dakota is the only State in the Union which bases the automobile license fees upon value, weight, and horsepower. With respect to his particular criticism, 10 of the States of the Union, including Delaware, Georgia, Michigan, Nevada, New Hampshire, New Mexico, North Carolina, Ohio, Oklahoma, Pennsylvania, and Wisconsin, have an automobile-license tax predicated alone upon weight and do not have any personal-property tax on automobiles. There are several other States which have an automobile-license tax based solely upon capacity and do not impose any personal-property tax upon automobiles. As suggested by the gentleman from Wisconsin, there is a wide variation in the way that the different States handle the subject, but a vast majority of them recognize either weight or capacity as a criterion upon which license charges should be fixed, because it is a license tax to operate motor vehicles upon the highways and the streets of the cities. The larger and heavier motor vehicles do more harm to the highway, they take up more room, and the jurisdictions generally have reached the conclusion that they should be made to pay in accordance with the damage they do to the highways as far as that can be arrived at. All the modern trend, all of the recent legislative acts on this subject, are in accord with that view. This committee has undertaken to present a modern, up-to-date bill, predicated upon the modern trend and the best thought and in the light of the tests and experiments in this respect. This principle has the full approval of the tax assessor of the District of Columbia.

Mr. FREAR. The reason for this weight and capacity is apparent to everyone because of the wear and tear upon the highways?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes. There is but little difference between weight and capacity, because the larger the bus or the truck the more weight and the more capacity. We have undertaken to impose license fees that would approach but not exceed the average that is imposed in the States of the Union. We believe we have done that in a fair and proper way, fair to the citizens of the District and fair to the Government of the United States.

The Clerk read as follows:

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 8. This act shall take effect on January 1 of the first calendar year following the enactment thereof, except that the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are authorized to provide for the registration of motor vehicles under this act, for such calendar year, beginning with the first day of the month preceding such effective date.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DAVIS: Page 13, line 2, strike out the word "January" and insert in lieu thereof the word "July."

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, at the time this was originally drafted, several months ago, we had in mind that perhaps the bill would become a law before January 1 next. Of course, we now know that it is impossible, and in order to not set too far in the future the effective date of the act, and also in order to conform with the taxable year in the District of Columbia on personal property, which is from July 1 to July 1, I offer this amendment, with the approval of the other members of the committee.

Mr. STAFFORD. The bill was predicated upon the idea that the rates to be paid, based on the various provisions, shall be for the calendar year. Should there not be, in connection with the gentleman's amendment, a provision that if it is to go into effect on July 1 the rate herein provided shall be proportionate?

Mr. DAVIS. I think there is a general provision in the bill to that effect.

Mr. STAFFORD. The bill as I read it provides that the rates shall be for the calendar year.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, perhaps it is better to leave this to be handled in the Senate or in conference. We do not know when the bill may finally pass. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. McMILLAN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5824) to require the registration of motor vehicles in the District of Columbia, to prescribe registration fees based upon the weight of such motor vehicles, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MAPES, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois if he can tell us whether we will consider the moratorium resolution on to-morrow?

Mr. RAINEY. We expect to take up the moratorium resolution to-morrow. When I left the committee room about an hour ago they thought they would be able to finish it to-night.

Mr. SNELL. Would it be possible for the House to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow, so that we could be sure to finish on Saturday?

Mr. RAINEY. I think we had better wait until we find out whether we can report the resolution out or not.

Mr. SNELL. It is expected to commence the consideration of that resolution the first thing to-morrow?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Illinois if we might not take up before the holiday recess a bill which has been reported to-day from the Committee on Banking and Currency dealing with the matter of relief of the Federal land banks? This bill has been ordered favorably reported to-day by a unanimous report from the Committee on Banking and Currency. It is one of the most important measures that will come before the Congress at this session, and it deals with one of the problems that lies more immediately at the door of a large portion of the membership of the House than probably any other problem that confronts us. It would not take more than one day, in my judgment, for all the necessary debate and consideration of this measure in the House. If it is agreeable, we would like to take it up before the recess.

Mr. SNELL. If it is a unanimous report from the committee, I do not see any reason why we could not take it up on Monday, although it was understood that nothing very controversial would be taken up at that time. I know this is an important link in the chain of recommendations made by the President, and if it comes with the unanimous approval of the Committee on Banking and Currency, I should expect it could pass the House without much trouble.

Mr. STEAGALL. I was intending to suggest that if developments happen to be such that the House should not be able to go along to-morrow with the consideration of the moratorium resolution, we might take up the Federal land bank bill on Saturday.

Mr. SNELL. I hope nothing will interfere with taking up the moratorium resolution to-morrow. It has gone out to the country that it will be taken up then, and I feel it is important to do that, but I should think we might take up the gentleman's bill on Monday.

Mr. STEAGALL. It was not in my mind, even remotely, to suggest deferring action on the moratorium resolution; but in the event the committee is not ready with that bill to-morrow, of course, we would like very much to go along with the other, meantime having in mind that we want to finish by Tuesday night, if we can.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Is this land bank bill far-reaching, or is it simply correcting some small administrative matters?

Mr. STEAGALL. It is both.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. In the past we have considered banking bills too hastily, and a few years later have lived to regret it. It would seem to me that in these times we ought to take a great deal of care and caution, and the Members, I am sure, want to study a bill of that kind very carefully.

Mr. STEAGALL. It is both an important measure and it is also a measure which deals with some minor features of the Federal farm loan act along administrative lines.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Are there any appropriations connected with it?

Mr. STEAGALL. I was about to say that the bill appropriates out of the Treasury a sum of $100,000,000, which is to constitute a revolving fund to be drawn on by any of the banks, with the approval of the Federal Farm Loan Board. Let me say to the gentleman from New York that this measure has been under consideration by the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House for quite a while. I introduced a bill substantially the same as the present measure during the last session of Congress, and extended hearings were had on that bill.

At that time the Federal Farm Loan Board and the Treasury Department were not willing to go along in favor of the legislation, and on that account I was unable to secure favorable action. Since then the President has seen fit to include substantially that legislation in the program he promulgated to the country some weeks ago. So the measure has been very fully considered.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. If I may be permitted to say to the gentleman, the fact that there is a unanimous report is not always an argument why the legislation should be considered hurriedly, because we get more information when there is a division and a minority report.

Mr. STEAGALL. I will say that for quite a while there was a division about this legislation, and it was discussed at length in that way.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield.

Mr. BRIGGS. As I understand, this legislation also deals with a moratorium to the great agricultural and farming interests of the United States—that is, the Federal land banks will be able to relieve them or grant extensions to them in needy cases.

Mr. STEAGALL. I will say to the gentleman, not assenting to the first suggestion, that the bill does not provide for a moratorium; that could not be properly said; but it does set up the necessary machinery or mechanics in the Federal Farm Loan act to enable the banks to grant extensions where, in the judgment of the officials of the banks, it should be done. We also embody in the bill a provision for the appropriation of $100,000,000, which we think will equip the banks with sufficient funds to enable officials of the banks to conduct their business in a common-sense way and to avoid working undue and unnecessary hardships upon borrowers.

Mr. BRIGGS. What I meant was that this bill would enable the banks to exercise a discretion which they have no power to do now, namely, to deal with extensions in cases of emergency and need.

Mr. STEAGALL. That is substantially true.

Mr. GOLDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes.

Mr. GOLDER. Did I understand the gentleman to say the bill was reported to-day?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes; it was ordered reported.

Mr. GOLDER. Was there a meeting of the committee to-day?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes.

Mr. GOLDER. I want to say to the gentleman that as a member of that committee I had no notice of the meeting. While I would not find fault with what was done, I had no notice of that meeting.

Mr. STEAGALL. I am very sorry indeed. It may have been due to an oversight on the part of the new and inexperienced force that now has charge of the affairs of the committee, but I undertook to see that every member had formal notice and was called over the telephone.

Mr. GOLDER. I call this to the gentleman's attention because at least one other member of the committee on this side also had no notice.

Mr. STEAGALL. I am very sorry, indeed. I certainly made every effort to make sure that every member was notified. We met the first day after the committees were made up and possibly we were in a little undue haste.

Mr. RAINEY. May I ask the gentleman whether this bill takes care of both systems of banks, the joint-stock land banks and the Federal land banks?

Mr. STEAGALL. No. This bill does not in any sense deal with or have any bearing upon the joint-stock land banks.

Mr. RAINEY. Did the association of joint-stock land bankers have any notice of these hearings?

Mr. STEAGALL. No; not at this session.

Mr. RAINEY. I notice that Everett Sanders, who represents them, issued a statement not long ago to the effect that remedial relief should also include the joint-stock land banks, and I was wondering whether he had been given any opportunity of appearing before the committee to present the claims of the joint-stock land banks. They have half as much money loaned to the farmers as the Federal land banks, as I remember it, and if you take care of one system that might mean the immediate bankruptcy of banks in the other system.

Mr. STEAGALL. I will say to the gentleman, speaking for myself, that I shall be glad to join with those who view the matter of legislation for the joint-stock land banks as important in working out any solution of that problem we can, and I will gladly devote my time to it as soon as opportunity may be had. However, it involves a very different matter from that which is involved in legislation touching the Federal land banks, the joint-stock land banks being private-investment institutions, entirely different from the Federal land banks. In that connection I will say also to the gentleman—which he knows, of course, better than I do—that all legislative accomplishments have to be worked out along practical lines, and we are trying to deal with the situation in a practical way to get as large a measure of relief for distressed farmers as we can——

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question along another line?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes; certainly.

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman expect to consider the bill reestablishing the War Finance Board very soon? I feel that is one of the most important proposals before the Congress and that it should receive early consideration.

Mr. STEAGALL. I will say to the gentleman that there is no such proposal before our committee. There is a bill before the committee which has been designated in language somewhat similar to the title of the War Finance Corporation act, but it is not very closely akin to the War Finance Corporation; it goes much further and takes a much wider range than the War Finance Corporation sought to do. But I will say to the gentleman that the Banking and Currency Committee has taken steps already to start investigation in connection with that legislation, and there is no purpose on the part of the committee to delay consideration of that or any other important legislation before it. We simply have to take up one thing at a time in dealing with matters of such far-reaching effect.

Mr. SNELL. I agree with the gentleman about that, but a great many people think this is one of the most important of any of the pending propositions.

Mr. STEAGALL. I fully agree with that suggestion, and therefore we are going to have to proceed carefully and after thorough investigation of the facts and full understanding of the provisions and purposes of the bill.

Mr. SNELL. I hope the investigation will be thorough, but that action will be taken as quickly as possible.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield.

Mr. SABATH. I do not know whether the gentleman's attention has been called to a bill introduced by me which the President recommends—H. R. 5116—to create a national relief finance corporation and to provide credits for industries and enterprises in the United States, and for other purposes. It is formed on the plan of the War Finance Corporation, but it is a much broader bill and a much better bill, and is a bill that I have been advocating for nearly two years. I have been seeking the gentleman and trying to secure a hearing on the measure.

Mr. STEAGALL. I will say to the gentleman that I shall be pleased to cooperate with him at any time in securing a hearing before the committee, and I am quite sure they will take up the question of considering the gentleman's measure as soon as practicable to do so.

Mr. SABATH. I have presumed that this is the measure the gentleman has had reference to because it is the only one on the subject that is pending before the gentleman's committee.

Mr. STEAGALL. I had in mind bill No. 5060, known as the Strong bill.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I am just wondering if the gentleman can give us any assurance that the Banking and Currency Committee is doing something of a constructive nature, as I am sure it is, to take care of the farmers and other people who are being distressed and pressed by these governmental agencies in the way of being foreclosed and other measures of that kind.

Mr. STEAGALL. I will say to the gentleman that the farmers of Alabama are about in the same fix as in his State, and I fully appreciate his desire to secure relief for them. I am just as anxious to secure relief as anyone can be.

Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes.

Mr. JONES. I would like to suggest in this connection that I think action on the measure which the gentleman has suggested is important in view of the fact that payments on these loans are semiannual and a great many of them come due the first of the year.

Mr. STEAGALL. That is quite true, and that is the thought in the minds of the members of the committee, who are anxious to expedite action on this particular legislation.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I do not think anything ought to have the right of way over the moratorium bill, and we could not make any agreement now that might interfere with the quick passage of that bill. That is a most important measure. If the Committee on Banking and Currency is unanimous as to this particular measure, and if we can consider it after the moratorium measure, I would be very pleased to see it brought up in the House.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. As I understand, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] is anxious to cooperate with the Committee on Ways and Means in having consideration of the moratorium bill to-morrow, if possible.

Mr. SNELL. That is our idea about it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Of course, the gentleman realizes that if the bill were not reported to-night and on the calendar to-morrow, if the technical objection were raised it could not be considered except by unanimous consent.

Mr. SNELL. I doubt if anyone would raise that technical objection.

Mr. BANKHEAD. But the gentleman realizes that it is an objection that could be raised?

Mr. SNELL. I appreciate that we would have to proceed, in that case, by unanimous consent.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does not the gentleman think that possibly that phase of the parliamentary situation ought to be taken cognizance of this afternoon?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. You could get a rule.

Mr. BANKHEAD. A rule could not be brought up until day after to-morrow.

Mr. SNELL. I think if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] asked unanimous consent at the present time, the gentleman could get it.

Mr. RAINEY. I will say now that if the moratorium measure is not ready to-morrow to be taken up, I will ask unanimous consent to take up this bill.

Mr. SNELL. I did not know but what the gentleman could get unanimous consent this evening with respect to the moratorium bill.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent now that the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee may have until 12 o'clock to-night to file a report on the moratorium bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee may have until 12 o'clock to-night to file report on the moratorium bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CONGRESS AND PUBLIC OPINION

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by printing in the RECORD a short radio address delivered by David Lawrence, editor of the United States Daily, on last Saturday evening on the subject "Congress and Public Opinion."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I insert a radio address by David Lawrence, editor of the United States Daily, December 13, 1931.

Just the other day some one said to me: "Government is unpopular; people don't like it." I realized how often I had heard something of the same kind for years. I recognized, as no doubt you will, the rising criticism of government as if it were a strange, abstract power, as if it were something that didn't belong to each and every one of us, as if it were a separate and distinct part of our national life.

Also many of you have heard, no doubt, the other point of view, especially when trouble or distress or disaster faces us: "But can't the Government do something about it? Why shouldn't the Government help?" These and similar questions reveal the currents and trends of our thinking about government, and you might well ask the meaning of such apparently conflicting concepts.

Well, let us consider for a moment the past week. Congress has assembled under circumstances strangely unlike anything else we have witnessed in our lifetime. Business is depressed. The world is full of unrest and uneasiness, and economic trouble washes every shore and touches every land. Mingled feelings express our attitude toward the meeting of Congress. Some people say: "Ah, here is cause for more uncertainty, more disturbance, more psychological uneasiness at a time when there should be steadiness." Others say: "At last something can be done; we have been drifting too long."

In these reactions again I have indicated the lines of cleavage, the two schools of thought toward government itself.

I have been in Washington 21 years. I have been studying government nearly 30 years. I have been groping, as many of you have, for the answer to such questions as I have just propounded. I have not grown cynical and brushed it aside as just so much politics, so much self-seeking or self-glorifying individualism. I have not been disappointed because I have seen Congress from time to time adopt legislation I have thought unwise or taken steps that I believed were impractical. I have instead come to some definite beliefs about government, which, it occurred to me, were especially characteristic of the situation in which we find ourselves this week.

Anybody who sees Congress year in and year out can, if he likes, think of it as an impersonal institution. But I can not. I can think only of the men I know, of their background at home, of the cities and towns they leave and the people they serve. If business is bad, is there a single Member of Congress who doesn't know it or feel it? Is there a single constituency in the United States which is not affected by our economic problems?

These Members of Congress, collectively or individually, can not be accused of being less interested in the public good than you or I. It is their business to represent the wishes of the people.

Yet, I can hear the critics say: "That's all right in theory, but what do these Congressmen really represent? Aren't they thinking of their own political fortunes—aren't they individualists after all?"

I will readily admit that there are men back home who could do a better job than some who are sent here. But we can not forget that, speaking by and large, every Member of Congress is the choice of some district or State, elected after a nominating contest, as a rule, and finally in an election in which one or more candidates appear. To be elected to Congress a man must have been at least a personality or have had something in his make-up which appeals to thousands and thousands of people.

For we are dealing here with elected representatives of the people. Every two years we can change every single Member of the House of Representatives—the whole 435 of them if we like. And every two years we have a chance to vote on whether 32 Members of the Senate shall stay in office or be retired in favor of 32 others. If we don't like our Congressmen we can elect others.

I recall these fundamental facts to you because they are so readily forgotten. Too many people are quick nowadays to condemn representative government, when, in fact, they do not care to utilize its remarkable processes.

For when you hear the comment: "Take the Government out of business," or "We must not let the Government do this or that," or "There's too much government and too many laws," we are merely indicting ourselves.

It is difficult to imagine why anybody should talk disparagingly of government without accusing himself or all of us of the very same thing. For, indeed, to me there is no such thing as a separate government, a separate entity, visualized by the word "government." There is no more reason to attack one's government than there is to condemn the trade association to which our business belongs or the fraternal order we have joined.

For the Government is not an alien thing—just a lot of buildings with an army of clerks or officeholders in them. Our governmental establishment is not foreign owned. It belongs to us. It is what we have made it. And if we don't like it we can unmake it and change its personnel and even rearrange its functions.

We may not like a man we have elected to office. We may not like a political party. We may not like a particular part of the Constitution, but does this justify us in making the sweeping assertion that all Government officials are corrupt, are wasteful, are bureaucrats, that all political parties are unpatriotic, and that the whole Constitution is obsolete or unworkable?

We show tendency to generalize, unfortunately, at a time when we should be specific. For the man who lambasts all government because he doesn't like a particular act is using the same phrases as the individual who attacks government because he wants anarchy. Both use the same approach. Both tend to undermine confidence in government; both are inclined to weaken the faith so essential to the success of a democracy.

What, then, are the causes of this abuse of Government, this constant show of contempt whenever it is suggested that the Government might help or the Government might tax or the Government might enact laws that we dislike? It is, to my mind, due to our unfamiliarity with the processes of representative government and our unwillingness to participate in them or be tolerant of the rights of others in a national community.

I said Congress met this week. How many people are predicting that Congress will do the wrong thing rather than the right thing; how many people are mistaking the wholesome exposure of views that comes out of controversial debate for the chaos or confusion that they seemingly attribute to all legislative bodies?

I have no such fears about Congress. I have watched its deliberations and have often disagreed with its conclusions. But I believe Congress is more often right than wrong. Five hundred and thirty-one men do not set about to ruin business or impose hardships on the rest of us. They do about what they think the people want them to do, and if the people do not manifest their wishes or desires, Members of Congress use their own judgment in expressing the public will.

Now, that's exactly where the difficulty arises. How does Congress know the public will? What do the people really want their Government to do? It is just that phase of the question which is the most perplexing of all and from which most of the misunderstanding about popular government really arises.

How about the letters and telegrams from constituents? How about the editorials in the press? How does public opinion form itself anyway? Here we come to something almost indefinable. For we may perceive the operations of public opinion, its indications of approval or disapproval, without always clearly seeing the forces that motivate its currents.

I presume at this point I ought to define that much-used term "propaganda." For there are many people who think propaganda decisively influences legislation. I think it plays a part, but a minor one. Propaganda is a word that has a good as well as a sinister significance. But because we associate it with improper influence it is more often regarded, as is the word "lobby," as if it were spurious. I believe that comes from the fact that too often letters and telegrams and communications ostensibly ask for one thing when concealed behind the words is some other motive or selfish purpose. A member of Congress is more impressed by a frank statement than a camouflaged argument. He can detect hypocrisy and insincerity more rapidly than the average man. The hard school of politics gives him that training.

I could not define if I tried the numerous ways in which public opinion manifests itself and actually affects the course of Congress. But I contend that it does. I am convinced we have a Government by public opinion. I have never lost my faith in that underlying principle. But I can see why it is vague, why it is often difficult to trace. It is because the people for the most part do not take the trouble to express their wishes. It is because we do not assert our individual rights as citizens of a representative Government. We do it in business in the sense that as stockholders we let the management alone if it is efficient and turn it out when things go wrong. But in government we don't exercise ourselves very much about the personnel of management. And I am afraid it's because we have not yet come to regard government as our own creature, as our own mouthpiece and spokesman. We prefer, unfortunately, to think of government as belonging to a group of politicians or so-called leaders, as if they constituted a kind of ruling class.

I assure you that, with a few exceptions, the politicians do not regard themselves as the sole owners of government. No group of men is more sensitive to the currents of opinion or more anxious to detect changes in popular thought than the men in public office. Politics, like the word "propaganda," has a good as well as a sinister meaning. In its worst sense it is the playing of individual forces for personal gain and advancement. In its finest sense it is an attempt to understand what the people want or what they should want if they were as familiar with the facts and circumstances as are their chosen representatives.

The element of judgment plays a vital part. Given all the facts, what course should be taken? Members of Congress are only human—they are neither infallible nor gifted with supernatural powers of insight. They can be misled by demagogues and propaganda at times; they can be diverted by powerful groups that menacingly assert themselves. So, it may be asked, Would they not profit by an aggressive, alert public opinion?

I believe they would. I do not think we can ever expect the American people to give minute attention to every detail of administrative or fiscal affairs. But we can expect the people to know the simple facts about government which surround the major problems. We can expect them to insist on knowing not one side of a case presented in one partisan newspaper or periodical but the other side as presented in another publication that perhaps takes an opposite point of view.

"I have no time to read," says one business man. "I am not interested in government; it's rather a bore," says a woman of education.

If we were to paraphrase these statements, they would read: "I have no time to be a citizen of the United States"; "I have no interest in the way our trustees in Federal, State, and city government spend $12,000,000,000 a year"; "Oh, yes; I pay taxes, but let some one else look after that."

And who is that "some one else"? How many people in a district take the time to write their Member of Congress; how many people in a State write their Senators? And of those who do write, how many are influenced by the effect on their own particular interest? How few indeed are conscious of a broad, national interest? The truth is, too few of our people really think about governmental problems and too few care enough to read much about them or get fact information about them. As a consequence, organizations, individuals, demagogues, persons with an ax to grind, adroit in invoking prejudice and passion fill us with slogans that catch the popular fancy and these waves of prejudice come dashing back to plague the Member of Congress. Sometimes he perceives them as the mere prejudices of an uninformed electorate. He wonders whether he should be guided by such influences or stand on convictions he has formed in his study at first-hand of all the facts.

Here we come to the inevitable conflict of personal advancement, the petty side of politics, and true statesmanship and public service. Here is where you suggest that a man should rather risk defeat than change his convictions. But human nature does not always make the solution so simple. It is humiliating to taste defeat.

What we need in public life is more men of moral fiber and courage, men who dare to be wrong, who are willing to sacrifice political careers for a conviction, men who can smile at the threats of groups and well-organized machines and associations that wield political power and propaganda, men who will make a painstaking effort to understand the facts of our national life and vote as their conscience dictates.

I am not even by inference seeking to disparage the Congress we have. I am trying to point out that government belongs to nobody but ourselves, that we can make it what we wish, that we can guide it, help it, serve it, but we can not do so by indifference. True citizenship is an obligation as deep and essential as true religion. It can not be delegated. It is individual and personal. The divine right of kings has given way to the divine right of sovereign thought in this the largest experiment in representative government the world has ever seen.

SENATE

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our Heavenly Father, who knoweth our frame, who remembereth that we are but dust, pardon all that we have done amiss. Strengthen our weakness and make us true instruments in the fulfillment of Thy holy purpose. Help us this day humbly and wisely to devote our talents to the larger claims of life in the service of our fellow men. Teach us to give and not to count the cost; to toil and not to seek for rest; to labor and not to seek reward save only consciousness of having done Thy will. Give us the sense of inner happiness that comes from living close to Thee, in fellowship with Him who by Thine own annointing was made fairer than the children of men, whose lips were full of grace, who loved righteousness and hated iniquity, and who lived His life in Thy sunshine's blaze that our day might brighter, fairer be, Jesus Christ, Thy Son, our Lord. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. FESS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 5822. An act to provide a tax on the transfers of estates of decedents;

H. R. 5823. An act to increase the motor-vehicle fuel tax in the District of Columbia, and to provide for the better administration thereof; and

H. R. 5824. An act to require the registration of motor vehicles in the District of Columbia, to prescribe registration fees based upon the weight of such motor vehicles, and for other purposes.

"PUBLIC OR PRIVATE OWNERSHIP"

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD an address delivered by Hon. Joseph B. Eastman before the American Academy of Political and Social Science at Philadelphia, Pa., on November 7, 1931, on the subject of public or private ownership.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The address is as follows:

Because of my official position, it may be well to say that I am here speaking for myself alone. For the same reason, it may also be well to say that I am not urging either immediate or early public ownership and operation of the railroads. Because of its magnitude, that would be an undertaking which ought not to be contemplated without most careful preparation and planning, and there has been nothing of the kind. Nor is the time ripe. Paradoxically, it is not so near to being ripe as it was some years ago. Transportation is now in an era of change. Competition is a bigger factor than it has been for many years. It is difficult to visualize even in the near future. Until we can see ahead a little more clearly, at least, I am not ready to advise that steps be taken toward public ownership and operation of the railroads.

Nor am I crusading for such ownership and operation of other utilities. I have certain convictions which I am quite willing to express. But the subject is an intensely practical one, and ought to be dealt with accordingly. Without much doubt progress will be made slowly, and I am not disposed to complain of that fact. Thought and public opinion on the subject are still in the development stage.

My views are the product of 25 years' observation of and experience with public utilities, and some 17 years' participation in their public regulation. These views may not be any the more valuable on that account, for experience does not always beget wisdom. But certainly they have been changing and developing in that time. At the beginning they were quite different from what they are to-day.

It is still a custom to brand the idea of public ownership and operation as socialistic, and dismiss it with that brand as opposed to what has been called rugged American individualism. But this is use of words to paralyze rather than promote thought. As a matter of fact, our individualism has always been tempered to a considerable degree with socialism, and the tendency has been to increase that degree. We have found that certain activities can best be carried on by the Government for the collective common good, instead of being left to private enterprise. Illustrations, which could be multiplied, are parks, highways and bridges, schools, fire protection, Postal Service, water supply. All these could be, have been, or to some extent still are carried on by private enterprise. We have found that these activities and numerous others can with advantage be socialized, and in that form they now have their place among accepted American institutions. In such instances Government has superseded, or at least invaded, the domain of business. There may be those who shudder at the thought, but certainly they are not conspicuous. Granting, therefore, that the public ownership and operation of public utilities is socialistic, the question presented is not one to be settled by the bandying of epithets or phrases, but the intensely practical question of whether these particular activities are of such a kind that they can with general advantage be socialized, in whole or in part, like many others which have already undergone that change.

We start, in the case of the public utilities, with the fact that they perform public functions. That fact has not only been conceded but proclaimed by our courts. They are, to use the language of the courts, "affected with a public interest." That is why we call them public utilities. Another fact which is no longer the subject of dispute is that they can not wisely be left solely to private enterprise. It is a fact established by sore and entirely convincing experience. Consequently, we subject them to public regulation, which means, to speak baldly but yet accurately, that within certain limits, which are capable of more or less indefinite expansion, the Government undertakes to control and direct their management. To that extent, therefore, these public services have already been socialized.

At this point I digress to mention a rather singular thing about public regulation. Its original purpose was to protect the public against extortion and unsafe, inadequate, or poor service. It is now regarded, also, as a means of protecting the regulated companies against each other, against their competitors, and even against the public. The transportation act, 1920 was motived to a very considerable extent by that thought, and in still greater degree it motives the present demand for the extension of public regulation in the case of motor busses and trucks, water carriers, airplanes, and pipe lines. As a further illustration, I venture the assertion with some confidence that if the railroads had been subject to no public regulation whatsoever, a general increase in freight rates during times like these would never have been proposed. It required a solidarity which I believe could not have been achieved under conditions of open, unregulated competition, and which in fact was not in the past achieved when such conditions prevailed.

Now, I am the last man to deny that public regulation serves very useful purposes in the general interest. I would not be a part of it if I thought otherwise. Nevertheless, it is open to certain obvious criticisms. Inevitably it means a responsibility which is divided and overlapping. When things go wrong, the companies can and do blame the commissions, the commissions can and do blame the companies, and the public can and does blame either or both. Such a system runs counter to what are ordinarily regarded as sound principles of administration. The clash in authority becomes more acute the more active public regulation is. Nor is responsibility divided only between the companies and the commissions. The authority of the latter is circumscribed by statutory and constitutional law. Only the courts can finally determine what the limits are, with the result that our judges become a third and very important factor in the situation, and hence indirectly in management.

The part which the commissions play in management under court surveillance is necessarily performed in a way which in itself is inconsistent with sound principles of administration, as generally understood. The commissions must obtain the information upon which they act, not as executives inform themselves, but through the long drawn-out processes of judicial procedures, with opposing witnesses supported by batteries of counsel and with the hazard, always, that the hostilities will be prolonged by appeal to the courts. Such procedure consumes time with the utmost prodigality, and labor and money as well as time. The burden falls alike upon the companies, the Government, and the general public. Many such proceedings, especially when questions of valuation were involved, have dragged their long way through months and even years of time.

Furthermore, management in part through public regulators has other singularities. To be done efficiently it requires, like any other difficult undertaking, much accumulated knowledge, experience, and acquired skill. Yet there is seldom an opportunity for the prior training of commissioners. As a rule, they must acquire much of their special knowledge and skill after they assume office. They are also subjected to the hazard of reappointment at stated intervals. And if they exhibit marked capacity, a demand for their services elsewhere, where standards of remuneration are higher, is likely to develop, and particularly from the very companies which they regulate. It is no easy thing to find men who are fitted for the job and willing to undertake it, and when they are willing it may be chiefly with the hope that the job will prove a mere stepping-stone to more profitable occupation. The result is that there are many inefficient men in public regulation, and the turnover among those who are efficient is very great.

This very condensed summary of the situation must at least suggest the thought that some better way can be found of directing the performance of the public functions which are the reason for the existence of the public utilities. And having sound principles of administration in mind, the thought must also suggest itself that a better and also simple way would be for the Government to take over these public functions itself and assume complete and undivided responsibility for their management in place of the partial responsibility which it has already assumed. At one stroke this would eliminate the troublesome question of valuation, greatly simplify financing, largely eliminate the courts as a time-consuming factor in the situation, and reduce cumbersome judicial procedure in connection with questions of management to a minimum. Such matters as service, issue of securities, accounting, new construction, and the general level of rates could ordinarily be handled in normal, administrative routine. A commission or some other tribunal might be necessary to pass upon certain questions where the clash of individual rights is involved, such as discriminations in rates, but the field of such procedure would be vastly narrowed.

Throughout this paper in speaking of "government" I use the word generically. Dependent upon circumstances it might be the Federal, a State, or a municipal government or some other governmental unit created for the purpose. It is unnecessary for present purposes to consider such distinctions.

Other things being equal, such a system of complete and undivided responsibility for management and operation has manifest advantages over the present system. The important question, of course, is whether other things are actually equal. Would the plan entail disadvantages which would offset or more than offset its apparent advantages?

The answer to this question most frequently voiced is in the affirmative. It is urged that the Government is bureaucratic and inefficient, lacks initiative, is often corrupt, would be controlled by political expediency rather than sound business principles, and would convert these utility services into mere parts of political machines. It is asserted that in all these respects government falls, and would continue to fall, far below the high level of private enterprise. If this indictment be true, this country must indeed be in a sorry pass, considering the great and vital functions which are already entrusted to the Government. The thought occurs that even so it might not be unwise to have direct public responsibility for these public-utility services which enter so intimately into the lives of the people. The result might be to create an irresistible demand for better government all along the line.

But my experience with government and with the private companies does not convince me that the indictment is true, or in any event that it must needs continue to be true. Bear in mind that the indictment has two aspects. One is the deficiency of government in certain respects, and the other is the superiority in the same respects of private enterprise.

Considering the latter aspect first, I have known many public utility companies that were operated with enterprise and economy. I have known some whose finances were conducted soundly and conservatively. I have also known some that kept out of "politics" in the baser sense of the word. On the other hand, I have known, and so have you, many that were ruined by financial exploitation of varying degrees of atrocity.

I have known many that were operated without enterprise or wastefully. And I have known many that were in "politics," of varying degrees of malodor, up to at least their necks. Perhaps the greatest danger in the case of private management of public utilities is the danger of financial exploitation. That is how most of the great private fortunes in this field have been made. It may be urged that this threat has been minimized by public regulation. Unfortunately, there are many ways of slipping out of that noose, and the chief of these is the holding company. When the full effects are realized of financial exploitation quite recently carried on through such companies in an era of general public regulation, I venture to predict that most of us will agree that this danger is still with us. Moreover, I assert with complete confidence that when such exploitation occurs, whether in the utility companies themselves or in corporate structures superimposed upon them, the effect is ultimately felt all down the line to and including both rates and service.

Bear in mind, also, that private enterprise is not the same thing as it once was. There is much less genuine individualism. As corporations grow larger and the stock is widely distributed in the hands of many small holders, the voice of the actual owners of the property grows faint and indistinct, and management falls into the hands of directors who are either selected by bankers or select themselves, and often have a most insignificant financial stake in the property. The thought occurs that possibly a President or a governor could select these directors as well as they are now selected. Also, the situation presents manifest possibilities of common, ordinary graft, and what has been done by certain large private corporations in the way of salaries and bonuses suggests that these possibilities have not been wholly overlooked.

So far as government is concerned, its deficiencies are many. Certainly there is vast opportunity for improvement. On the other hand, the experience which I have had in government has been far from discouraging in this respect. I have served in two—the government of Massachusetts and the Government of the United States. From what I have observed, I am persuaded that if all the instances of enterprise, initiative, and efficiency, to say nothing of mere honesty, in these two governments were collected and brought to light, the public would be astonished and heartened by the sum total. In saying this I am leaving out of consideration the departments in which I have personally served.

Comparing the relative merits and demerits of government, on the one hand, and of the public-utility companies, on the other, I am not sure how the balance tips. But that is really not the important thing. Assuming the present superiority of private enterprise and conceding the defects in the public service, are these defects inevitable? If government were given direct responsibility for the public functions which the utility companies now perform, is there nothing which can be done to safeguard the situation with a view to eliminating or reducing the defects, and if there is, what direction should it take? It is in the consideration of this question that the great opportunity for creative thought and effort lies. It opens up a field which has hardly been touched, at least in this country, and I believe the possibilities are very great.

Public ownership need not be combined with public operation. It is quite possible to contract for private management and to provide in the contract such definite safeguards against exploitation and abuse as may be desired. Personally, I incline toward public operation as well as ownership. But such operation need not be through an ordinary Government department or bureau. Instead, it can, and I believe should be, carried on just as private operation is carried on, through the medium of a separate corporation, with the Government as the stockholder.

Not long ago I sketched out such a plan in an article in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, not in any way as a final solution of the problem but largely to provoke thought. Time does not permit going into details here, but I can indicate some of the essentials.

The use of such a corporation would make it possible to conduct the industry separate and distinct from other governmental activities, on a self-sustaining basis, and in a form permitting ready examination into its affairs, to manage it in accordance with honest business practice, and to remove it from ordinary political influences. A board of public trustees appointed by the executive branch of the Government would function as directors and be solely responsible for the management of the corporation in accordance with its charter powers and purposes. The legislative branch of the Government would be responsible for the latter but would be without other authority to interfere with management except through powers of investigation. In itself the proper drafting of the charter would be a very important duty. The trustees would be under oath to manage the property with regard solely to economy and efficiency and the provision of the best possible service at the lowest rates consistent with the full costs of the undertaking, including proper upkeep and the maintenance of adequate depreciation and other necessary reserves. They would be strictly prohibited from appointing or removing employees at the behest of any public officeholder. Plans could easily be shaped and adopted for recognizing and rewarding especial merit in officers and employees and for toning up the morale of the entire force.

If it were thought desirable, as a further safeguard, provision could be made for the selection of a minority of the trustees by nonpolitical elements having a natural interest in sound operation and management. The business and labor interests of the community might, for example, be so represented. In the case of a very large undertaking more than one corporation, possibly several, might be desirable.

Details I am omitting. The plan is capable of a great variety of modifications and development along different lines. There is nothing original about it, for it is largely made up of ideas which have severally, and to some extent jointly, already been put into practice either in this country or abroad. An excellent board of public trustees appointed by the Governor of Massachusetts is now directing the affairs of the Boston Elevated Railway Co., and after 12 years of trial the people of the district served voted last year to continue the plan in operation. Less than a third voted in favor of return to private management. It is conceded that the company has been kept out of politics. The Canadian National Railway is operated by a corporation with directors appointed by the government, and has a most efficient management. Those who point to the deficits which that railroad system is now incurring forget the fact that it is an aggregation of lines, many of them built in advance of the development of the country, which experience had proven could not be successfully operated by private enterprise. They forget the extraordinary improvements in service and earnings under a public management headed by a man, Sir Henry Thornton, conceded to be in the front rank of railroad operators, and who, by the way, is a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania and got his early railroad training on the Pennsylvania Railroad system. They forget, also, the general depression in railroad earnings at the present time. An outstanding example in England is the Central Electricity Board, established not by a Labor but by a Conservative Government. The German railroads, as now operated, furnish a further illustration, and there are many others.

As an illustration of the progress of thought along these lines in England, I quote the following from a leading English weekly:

"The idea of public administration has hitherto connoted in men's minds the idea of control by Parliament or by an elected local authority. It will, we hope and believe, continue to involve this idea in matters of high policy plainly concerning the public interest. But we have to learn, as we are learning already in the case of the British Broadcasting Co., to distinguish between ultimate control over policy and supervision of the affairs of day-to-day administration. We have to learn that if we are to manage public services efficiently, we shall have to leave their administrators to get on with the job, reserving the right to criticize and to replace them if they bungle, but leaving them free over a wide field to settle current questions on their own responsibility."

For the financial overlords of our railroads and public utility companies I have no particular admiration. For many of the men who are in direct charge of operation, however, I have the utmost respect. Given a plan for the public operation of these industries which will give the managers a degree of autonomy somewhat comparable to that existing in private industry and which will protect them against continual petty and political influence, I am confident that no difficulty would be experienced in obtaining the services as executives of men of the highest ability and character. The great business executives of the present day neither own nor control the properties which they manage. They must all serve somebody, and given a fair chance, I have little doubt that many of them would prefer serving their country or their State or their city to serving purely private interests and profit.

That such conditions of public ownership and operation can be established I thoroughly believe. The plan which I have outlined in a very general way may not be the right one, but an adequate plan can be developed if sufficient brain power is concentrated upon it. It is to that end that thought should be directed. Needless to say, however, the wisdom of such a plan in the case of any particular government—and I have municipalities particularly in mind—might be affected by the existing character and stage of development of that government.

This paper must perforce be brief. The subject is such that it would be expanded almost indefinitely. There are some points that I would like to have expanded. Some day I hope to say something about the development of efficiency in the public service generally, regardless of whether it is broadened to include these utility services. The astonishing thing is that so much efficiency may be found when so little thought has been given to ways and means of developing it. If time permitted, I should also be glad to correct certain misapprehensions concerning the United States Railroad Administration during the war period, who ran it, what it accomplished, and what lessons it taught. I had opportunities for close observation of all these matters.

Let me in closing say—what it is hardly necessary to suggest—that no system of operating utilities can be made perfect, whether it be private or public. There always will be defects and room for improvement. The important thing is to find the system which is potentially the best. It will be found, I believe, somewhere in the general direction of public ownership and operation. But even if the immediate defects of such a system of ownership and operation should prove greater than I anticipate, that alone would not completely condemn it. There are impressive reasons for believing that it is desirable for government to assume direct responsibility for all functions which are conceded to be of a public character. Not only is such a course the only one consistent with a due regard for the dignity of government, but the moment that important public functions are delegated to private enterprise powerful bodies of men are created with a direct personal and financial stake in government and hence having an incentive to meddle with it and shape its policies, if they can, to fit their own selfish ends. Such influences operating upon government in one way or another are one of the important reasons, I believe, for its present defects.

One final word: It is a tenet held by many that the desire for financial gain is the only motive which will impel men to their best endeavors. I challenge that tenet whole-heartedly. I was brought up in a minister's family; I have enjoyed the friendship of doctors, school teachers, and professors; and I have had some opportunity to observe men in public life, as well as many engaged in business. My very profound belief is that the best things which have been done in the world have been impelled by higher motives than the desire for financial gain; that these higher motives have an influence much more widespread than is commonly supposed; and that the desire for gain, while it may impel to certain valuable endeavors, never impels the best and often impels the worst.

THE WORLD COURT

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I have here an article by a gentleman whose legal ability is recognized by everyone, who is a patriot, and whose patriotic devotion to the country can not be questioned. He is discussing a proposition submitted to the World Court some time ago and decided by it. It is the matter of the proposed customs union between Austria and Germany. I think the statement should be made available to everyone, whether for the court or against it. This article is by the Hon. John W. Davis, and I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, is this the article contributed by Mr. Davis to the Atlantic Monthly?

Mr. JONES. It is.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. My recollection is it has already been placed in the RECORD.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; I think that has been done.

Mr. JONES. If it has already been published, I shall withdraw the request; but I am informed that it has not been done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerks will examine the RECORD, and if it has been done it will not be again printed; otherwise, without objection, the article will be printed in the RECORD, as requested.

The instinctive American reaction to the news that the World Court had been asked for an advisory opinion in the matter of the proposed customs union between Austria and Germany was that the court would do well to put the stamp of its approval on the customs union. The average American editor expressed the characteristic impression of the man in the street that the customs union was probably an excellent step, a first move toward breaking down the artificial tariff barriers from which Europe and the world are suffering. France, it was felt, as leading advocate of the idea of a United States of Europe, could not properly object to this concrete step toward economic recovery. Besides the feeling that Austria must certainly get help from some quarter, and that Germany should be permitted by the rest of the world to take any and all steps that would place her in a position to pay her debts, there also came into play the characteristically American philosophy that two sovereign states should be allowed to limit their own sovereignty in any way they chose without the prior consent of third parties or the sanction of any court.

These entirely natural feelings were freely expressed last May in complete disregard of the fact that the court would have no opportunity whatever to pass upon the very interesting question of the desirability or undesirability of the customs union proposed by the Vienna protocol of March, 1931, or its advantages or disadvantages to the future of Austria, of Germany, of Europe, or the world at large. As a matter of fact, the court was asked to pass merely upon the compatibility of three treaties, and to decide whether Austria's undertakings in the customs pact of 1931 were or were not compatible with the international obligations assumed by Austria in article 88 of the treaty of Saint-Germain and in the first Geneva protocol of 1922, the latter made at the time of the reconstruction loans to Austria. Germany is not, of course, a signatory to either of these earlier treaties, and therefore the legal propriety of Germany's action was not included in the question put to the court. The neat question upon which the court was asked to give its advisory opinion was as follows:

"Would a régime established between Austria and Germany on the basis and within the limits of the principles laid down by the protocol of March 19, 1931, be compatible with article 88 of the treaty of Saint-Germain and with protocol No. 1 signed at Geneva on October 4, 1922?"

In short the court was faced with the necessity of interpreting and comparing certain explicit agreements, not of announcing its opinion upon the policies they pressed.

It was natural enough, however, that this point should be entirely missed by the public consciousness of this country, and apparently of Europe as well, if one may judge from editorial comment there. The public had not before it the text of the question or the text of the treaties. It knew only that what seemed a desirable measure hung in the balance. And when, on September 5, the court gave its opinion, the public felt some disappointment that this apparently desirable measure had been disapproved. The court was assumed to have "declared against the customs union," and the protest against its opinion was immediate and voluminous. To the popular mind a blow had been struck at the cause of economic recovery, if not at the principle of the sovereignty of states, and, by the same token, at the prestige of the court.

I shall not be so rash as to assert that the public reaction would have been different if it had, between May and September, been made clear from every rostrum in the country that the court was passing merely upon the compatibility of certain treaties and not upon the desirability per se of the proposed customs union. In this country, perhaps in most countries, the general public is characteristically impatient of an adverse judicial determination of any problem that ramifies widely into social and economic life. The public consciousness is, often very healthfully, on the alert to detect a partial or narrowly legalistic attitude toward a question. The average citizen, moreover, jealously maintains his inalienable right to see the issue in a wider sense than that in which it could possibly come before any court. And by the practical event he is inclined to weigh not merely the court's wisdom, but not infrequently its judicial integrity.

In the case of the present opinion, some of those who have abstained from ascribing the court's finding to political motives have, nevertheless, deplored the court's narrow conception of its function. Say they, in effect: "The court had an opportunity to do good and did not avail itself of the opportunity." Even some of the commentators whose training and experience would seem to imply capacity to understand the sharp limitations of the question before the court and the nature of the judicial function itself have apparently felt this to be one of those cases in which, looking to the equities, the court, in order to achieve a great right, might have ventured to do a little juridical wrong. Those who make a virtue of decrying "legalistic" tendencies find it easy to believe that most documents can be construed one way as easily as another, and that therefore not to "choose" the way that leads to the happiest result is at best a great pity, and at worst evidence of lack of judicial integrity.

In the Austro-German case the division of the judges, with the judge from France on the majority side and the judges of England, Germany, the United States, and Japan upon the other, has offered dramatic opportunity for voicing hasty conclusions and prejudices. Any presumption that the judges acted as judges and not as national representatives has been entirely left out of the reckoning by certain critics. That portion of the public which never had directed its gaze to the nature of the question upon which the court was passing, or to the legal basis of the court's finding, or to the closeness and difficulty of the question presented, has focused its attention entirely on two lists of judges assumed to be "representing" their countries in the position they took rather than working out for themselves a legal conclusion based on rational grounds. This assumption that political desires rather than judicial deliberation motivated the court leads naturally enough to such loose speculations and comment as that the decision is in the spirit of the Versailles and Saint-Germain treaties rather than in the spirit of postwar sanity; that the majority opinion was dominated by the French policy of restraining the restoration of German influence, and the minority opinion was dominated by the governments disposed to assist German restoration; that the opinion represents a triumph of French financial prestige; that it dramatizes the imperialistic attitude of France toward the great modern movement to lower customs barriers; that it subtly attacks the whole conception of a united states of Europe advanced by France herself; that the division illustrates the Latin versus Nordic cleavage, as to outlook on law and on life, and so on and so on. All of which speculations and inferences are sufficiently natural if we allow the original premise that the judges, having regard to national prejudices, voted like ordinary politicians for the folks back home.

The confusion caused by criticism of the above type is worse confounded by certain attempts at "defense." The defenders accept the probability that political motives largely affected the decision, but they become worldly and philosophical about it. They point out that no impossible standards of perfection should be set up for this international court; that judges are not, after all, archangels; that the donning of the ermine does not automatically release its wearer from the natural tug of political influences; that in no court in the world are judges able to dissociate themselves 100 per cent from their inherited prejudices; that this court is in its early years; and that if we followed the policy of doing away with a court because it had been accused of responding to sectional or political influence we should have abolished our own Supreme Court years ago. The more "philosophical" of the defenders enunciate as doctrine that most courts in the end respond to the pressure of opinion and events, and should arouse no wonder by so doing; and the less philosophical hold that the real error probably lay in expecting any court to be able to rule on a question in which politics and law are inextricably mingled.

All of this "defense" of whatever nature seems to me quite beside the point for exactly the reason that impairs the criticisms cited above. Both rest not upon a study of the case, upon analysis of the reasoning, but upon an a posteriori assumption that the court failed. It would be a sheer waste of effort to attempt to answer a mass of speculative criticism that entirely ignores the question the court was passing on, the history of the case, the content of the pleadings, and the complex nature of the opinions finally arrived at by groups within the court. The comments touched upon above, if cited fully, would soon answer themselves by their contradictions. I have read comments "proving" that the majority met the legal question and the minority did not; and, from apparently as competent sources, comments proving that the minority was guided by law and the majority by politics. The fantastic attempt to demonstrate a Latin-Nordic line up shows the need to beware of the extremists on both sides. I submit that the only fair and rational ground on which to explain the line-up of the judges is the assumption that the judges acted first of all as judges and split, as judges will and must and do, upon questions clearly susceptible of different conclusions.

I am prepared to maintain that in the present instance the court worked out a difficult case juridically, and moreover that the majority arrived at what, in my humble judgment, is the sounder result. If the minority opinion had prevailed, I should, while not wholly agreeing with it, still be able to understand the reasoning by which it was reached The test of soundness is certainly not unanimity. If we have come to the point where we challenge the existence of courts because the judges differ materially we shall have to rewrite history. It is high time that the public attention vouchsafed to this case should be led back to the essential considerations: (1) What was the question with which the court was called to deal? (2) Was that question sufficiently difficult and close to make possible and natural a cleavage upon purely juridical lines? Those students who incline, as do I, to the conclusion that the court's decision is correct will not find it less sound because the French judge voted for it, however much they may approve or disapprove the French political outlook and what they may choose to consider the present French tendency to sit on the lid that covers a reviving or at least a struggling Germany and Austria.

It may be that a genuine study of this case is exactly what some of the most articulate critics of it hope to avoid, for themselves and for others. For so soon as it is understood it ceases to be available as ammunition, and the opponents of the adherence of the United States to the court have made it clear that to their minds this decision has rolled a marvelous train of ammunition into their camp. Indeed, if one may judge by certain expressions in the public prints, the friends of the court have lost by this opinion a great deal that they never had. The gifted enemies of the court have persistently shown a flexible capacity for seizing upon attractive new reasons for old positions. But what the situation with these amounts to, to paraphrase the words of Mr. Dooley, is that those who have been against the court in all circumstances are now opposed to it in any circumstances. That is all.

Those of more open mind, however, and those honest students and observers who have been puzzled or chagrined by the court's opinion in this case may properly be invited to consider the case as the court had it and not the fancied case that some would seek to depict.

II

The majority opinion finds that the terms of the Vienna protocol of 1931 are incompatible with the first Geneva protocol of 1922. Six of the majority conclude that the Vienna protocol is incompatible as well with article 88 of the treaty of St. Germain of 1919. Anzilotti arrives at this same conclusion, though by an independent line of reasoning developed in a separate opinion. The minority opinion contends that the customs pact is not incompatible with either the treaty of Saint-Germain or the first Geneva protocol. After a study of all of these opinions and of the texts on which they are based I not only find enough fully to justify the decision but I find nothing whatever to warrant the conclusion that the eight judges in the majority were guided by political motives from which the seven in the minority were miraculously delivered.

It is in point to review briefly the earlier engagements of Austria, which it was claimed the customs pact would contravene, and the conditions under which they were exacted and made. Let us take as first in order the treaty of Saint-Germain. When, at the end of the war, various nations or national elements that had been incorporated in the Austro-Hungarian Empire, like Hungary, Poland, and Czechoslovakia, were set up as independent nations, the economic situation of the remnant of Austria became very difficult, and a movement began, which, as we all know, is still continuing, for the Anschluss, or the incorporation of Austria with Germany. The Allies, then determining the conditions of peace at the Paris conference, felt, whether rightly or wrongly is immaterial here, that it was essential to the future peace of Europe that Austria should continue as a wholly independent state. A provision to that effect was incorporated in the treaty of Versailles (art. 80, treaty of Versailles: "Germany acknowledges and will respect strictly the independence of Austria within the frontiers which may be fixed in a treaty between that state and the principal allied and associated powers; she agrees that this independence shall be inalienable except with the consent of the council of the League of Nations."), in which Germany acknowledged and agreed to respect the independence of Austria within the frontiers to be fixed for it in a treaty between Austria and the Allies, and agreed that this independence should be inalienable, except with the consent of the council. Nevertheless the Anschluss movement continued to grow. Soon after the Versailles treaty had been signed, but before it had gone into effect by the deposit of ratifications, a new constitution for Germany was adopted at Weimar which contained a provision for the representation of "German Austria" in the Reichsrat "after its reunion with the German Empire." The Allies at once sent a letter of protest to the German delegation, calling this provision a violation of article 80; and Germany thereupon signed a formal declaration admitting that this provision was null and void. A few days later the treaty of Saint-Germain, making peace with Austria, was signed; in article 88 it provides that "the independence of Austria is inalienable otherwise than with the consent of the council of the League of Nations. Consequently Austria undertakes in the absence of the consent of said council to abstain from every act which might directly or indirectly or by any means whatever compromise her independence, particularly, and until her admission to membership of the League of Nations, by participation in the affairs of another power."

A few weeks thereafter, in response to an appeal from the Austrian Chancellor in connection with separatist movements, the supreme council of the Allies adopted a resolution showing the official interpretation they put on this article, which declared that they would oppose any step that would be calculated to violate the integrity of Austrian territory, "or which, contrary to the provisions of article 88, would have the effect of compromising in any way, directly or indirectly, the political and economic independence of Austria." This was after the treaty had been signed but before it had been ratified.

Note, if you please, the sweeping language employed in this article 88. It declares not merely that the independence of Austria shall be inalienable without the consent of the council, but that Austria shall abstain from "every act" which might "directly or indirectly," or "by any means whatever," either alienate or even "compromise" her independence. No terms more all-embracing could possibly have been found.

And here we may pause to ask, as the court did, what is meant by this word "independence," this thing so jealously guarded under the terms of the treaty, for it is precisely in the definition of this term that the divergence between the majority and minority of the court most clearly appears. The minority, while conceding that the word has received diversified definitions, approaches the matter from the negative angle. They define what it is by declaring what it is not. They conclude that a state would not be independent in the legal sense if it was placed in a condition of dependence on another power—if it ceased itself to exercise within its own territory the summa potestas or sovereignty, i. e., if it lost the right to exercise its own judgment in coming to the decisions which the government of its territory entails. Restrictions on its liberty of action which a state may agree to do not affect its independence, provided that the state does not thereby deprive itself of its organic powers.

And so, while fully accepting the view of their colleagues that when the treaty used the word "compromise" it meant "involve danger to" or "endanger" or "imperil," they hold that before any act can come within the condemnation of the treaty it must imperil the continued existence of Austria as a state capable of exercising within its territory all the powers of an independent state as above defined.

Now, this definition seems to me, with all due respect, not only to be too narrow in point of international law but, when applied to the case under consideration, to beg the whole question with which the court was called to deal. It is too narrow in point of law, for independence surely means something more than dominion over a given territory or the inhabitants it contains. States act abroad as well as at home, and their policies are both foreign and domestic. Independence means also something more than the naked possession of those organic powers necessary to constitute a state. States may retain their powers as political organisms and yet have so "compromised" or bargained away their freedom of action that, although they have kept the outward shell of independence, they have lost in fact its substance. Sir Frederick Smith (afterwards Lord Birkenhead), one of the most brilliant Englishmen of our day, puts the true conception in his work on international law.

"An independent State is entitled to live its own life in its own way, the sole judge within the law of its domestic government and its foreign policy."

Or, if I may add without becoming tiresome a quotation from a standard American authority, Hall on International Law:

"Independence is the power of giving effect to the decisions of a will that is free in so far as absence of restraint by other persons is concerned. The right of independence, therefore, in its largest extent, is a right possessed by a state to exercise its will without interference on the part of foreign states in all matters and upon all occasions with reference to which it acts as an independent community."

I can find no fault, therefore, with the majority of the court in their holding that the independence of Austria, within the terms of the treaty of Saint-Germain as well as of the Geneva protocol, means "the continued existence of Austria within her present frontiers as a separate state, with sole right of decision in all matters economic, political, financial, or other." And having in view the circumstances attending the making of the treaty as well as the sweeping language employed, I find it hard to believe that the contracting parties understood the word in any more limited sense.

It does not advance the argument, but merely begs the question at issue, to say, as do the minority of the court in the quotation I have given, that "restrictions on its liberty of action which a state may agree to do not affect its independence." Yet this sentence, with the idea it conveys, is the hinge on which the whole dissenting opinion turns. Of course, an independent state can enter into such contracts or treaties as it chooses. It can limit its freedom of action in many ways without actually depriving itself of its "organic" powers. It can make offensive and defensive alliances, both military and commercial; it can submit to the will of a stronger power in order to secure that power's protection; it can grant to other states monopolies over its commerce; it can alienate parts of its territory; in many other ways short of absolute surrender it can compromise or endanger or imperil its independence—all in pursuit of its own free will. None of these things, however, can it lawfully do if it has previously agreed to the contrary. For, as Vattel puts it: "A sovereign who is already bound by one treaty can not enter into others in conflict with the first." So, if Austria definitely agreed, as surely she did in the treaty of Saint-Germain, that she would not surrender in any way her liberty of action without the consent of the council of the league, it is quite beside the point to consider what she or any other state might have done if no such promise had been made. To say that Austria freely consented to the customs union does not aid at all in determining whether she could remain entirely free after the union had been formed.

Coming back from this quite necessary digression to the second of the treaties under consideration, it appears that the obligations of the treaty of Saint-Germain were repeated, and more extensively defined in the first Geneva protocol of 1922 when France, Italy, Czechoslovakia, and Great Britain made the so-called reconstruction loans to Austria, then in great financial difficulties. By this protocol, the four powers—with Spain and Belgium, who afterward acceded to the protocol—on their part undertake "for the protection of the interests of the creditors and of the guarantor states" to "respect the political independence, the territorial integrity, and the sovereignty of Austria"; and not to "seek to obtain any special or exclusive economic or financial advantage calculated directly or indirectly to compromise that independence." They further agree, "should occasion arise," to appeal "either individually or collectively to the council of the league," and to conform to the decisions of the council.

Austria, on the other hand, engages "in accordance with article 88 of the treaty of Saint-Germain not to alienate its independence; it will abstain from any negotiations or from any economic or financial engagement calculated directly or indirectly to compromise this independence.

"This undertaking shall not prevent Austria from maintaining, subject to the provisions of the treaty of Saint-Germain, her freedom in the matter of customs tariffs and commercial or financial agreements, and, in general, in all matters relating to her economic régime or her commercial relations, providing always that she shall not violate her economic independence by granting to any state a special régime or exclusive advantage calculated to threaten this independence."

This, then, was the situation. Germany had agreed in the Versailles treaty that Austria's independence was inalienable otherwise than with the consent of the council; Austria had agreed to the same thing in the treaty of Saint-Germain, with the further promise that, in the absence of the council's consent, she would abstain from any act which might directly or indirectly compromise this independence, and still later, in the Geneva protocol, that she would abstain even from any negotiations or economic or financial engagements calculated directly or indirectly to compromise it, and, moreover, that she would not violate her economic independence by granting to any state a special régime or exclusive advantages calculated to threaten this independence. It was in the face of these covenants that the two nations announced last March their agreement to form a customs union on the basis of the principles contained in the Vienna protocol of March 19, 1931. The consent of the council was not asked. The action was protested as in violation of the treaties. On the motion of Great Britain, an advisory opinion was requested from the court.

The customs union contemplated by this protocol is, as the mere reading of it will show, of the most thoroughgoing and finished character. In so far as it abolished all import and export duties between the parties while maintaining them against those not covered by a similar arrangement, it is confessedly a special régime of a reciprocally exclusive character. The mere fact that the parties express a willingness to negotiate in similar terms with other powers does not destroy the exclusive advantages of the arrangement in the meantime. Although it is true that each state must necessarily put the agreed tariff into force in its own territory by its own legislative and executive agencies, it is covenanted that the states shall act concurrently in doing so and that no amendments can be made to the tariff law or customs tariff without mutual consent. Internal customs duties, their rates, duration, and categories, the turn-over tax, and the exchange of goods covered by monopolies or excise duties in either country, are to be the subject not of independent action but of joint agreement. The duties received in the joint area are not to belong to the state collecting them but are to be apportioned according to an agreed quota.

When it comes to arrangements to be made with other states article 9 of the protocol—somewhat blandly, it would seem—reserves to each of the two governments "in principle" the right to conclude commercial treaties with third states on its own behalf. Yet immediately all the vitality is sucked out of this ostensible right by the spirit, if not the exact letter, of the two succeeding paragraphs. One of these obligates each state to see that the interests of the other are not violated in any negotiations with third states. The other provides that "so far as it seems opportune and possible" (and one can hardly imagine when or how it would be otherwise), "with a view to effecting a simple, speedy, and uniform settlement of the commercial arrangements with third states," they will jointly negotiate and simultaneously ratify their commercial treaties with other nations. The language of treaties often stops by design somewhat short of expressing the real intent; but it requires no deep insight to penetrate the meaning here or to foresee the inevitable result that waits upon these words. They can mean nothing else but that the parties henceforth are to make commercial war and commercial peace by concerted action, together and not alone.

Finally, for those cases in which the customs treaty requires an agreement between the parties or the consent of the one or the other, a joint arbitral committee is to be set up which shall have power by majority vote—with a casting vote by its president in case of a tie—to effect, when consent has failed, a compromise through its own binding decision, which shall stand in place of the agreement or consent of the unwilling party; leaving, it is true, to either government the right to terminate the treaty upon six months' notice if a decision of the committee infringes "its vital economic interests." The minority opinion as to this point merely observes that any arrangement that provdes for the friendly settlement of differences, whether justifiable or not, can hardly in these days be said to be calculated to threaten the independence of the states concerned. This may all be true, and yet this plausible general observation seems to me to take no account of the especial powers vested in this arbitral committee.

Such, in bare outline, is the régime which the protocol proposes to establish. The minority judges, in an attempt to point out the divergence between themselves and their colleagues of the majority, say:

"If this (the majority opinion) means that the conclusion of a customs union between two states, irrespective of the details of the arrangement, involves danger to the independence of the states concerned, it is an opinion which the undersigned are unable to accept."

This would seem to be perfectly obvious, but it is precisely the details of this proposed arrangement which come on to be judged, since by these details the régime itself is defined.

For my part, I should have no difficulty whatever in concluding that both by its express terms and by its probable consequences the régime would compromise, endanger, imperil, threaten—to use the words on which the majority and the minority of the court were agreed—that economic independence, that unfettered freedom of will and of decision, which, lacking the consent of the council, Austria had solemny covenanted to preserve inviolate. The minority opinion takes the view that the protocol does not contemplate a "customs fusion," but merely an "assimilation" of the tariff and economic policies of the two countries—"that is, each of the two countries will have its own policy, but the two will coincide." With the greatest respect to the distinguished jurists who employed these phrases, they seem, when we view the terms of the agreement and the surrounding circumstances, to be a mere play upon words. It is far more accurate to say that neither country is to have its own policy, but both are to have the joint policy and the joint policy alone.

All the judges of whatever shade of opinion were agreed that the court must consider the proposed customs treaty from a practical standpoint, weighing those consequences which might reasonably be foreseen. They were not dealing with mere legal subtleties and abstractions. All of them likewise agreed that they were concerned solely with the law and not with political considerations or questions of policy. Judge Anzilotti concurred with the conclusion of the majority, but struck out on a line of reasoning of his own, occupying in some respects a middle ground between the two major groups into which the court was divided. But in the light of those facts of general and universal knowledge which courts no more than laymen are permitted to ignore, it takes no use of the imagination to conclude with him that, "in view of the great disproportion in the economic strengths of Germany and Austria, it must be regarded as reasonably probable that Austria's economic life would sooner or later become dependent upon Germany's." The protocol is scrupulous in using terms of equality between the parties; but in a partnership like this Austria, with her pronounced inferiority in area, in population, in wealth, in trade, would seem to be foredoomed forever to play a minor and an increasingly subordinate rôle.

Let us put an analogy. Suppose, instead of being related to commerce and customs, this Vienna protocol had undertaken to deal with matters of armament and defense. I choose this illustration because there is something about military contracts that makes their results easier to foretell than those that deal with commerce and finance, although the operation of the latter may be just as inexorable. An agreement is proposed between these same parties, let us say, for a common military policy; a common armament, to be distributed on a quota basis; a joint negotiation of treaties of offense and defense with other powers; a covenant to protect each the other's interest in any treaty made; and finally a joint general staff to determine without appeal the common action when the governments themselves were unable to agree. Who would be prepared to say that such a plan would not compromise or threaten the independence and free will of Austria and thus violate the pledges she had given?

III

It is regrettable, but certainly not discouraging, that the court was unable to reach a unanimous decision and that the division was so close as 8 to 7. A counsel of perfection would suggest that judges should always be able to reach a concordant opinion. It does not turn out that way, however, in real life, not even in America. If you doubt it, ask any American lawyer or read for yourself the long list of 5-to-4 decisions by which so august and respected a body as the Supreme Court of the United States has disposed of matters of the most vital consequence. Such happenings are due in part to the inescapable fact that men's minds are not cast in a common mold. If they were, one judge on a court of last resort would do as well as a dozen. Commonly these things occur because the questions under consideration are close and difficult, and the arguments for and against one or the other conclusion are so nicely poised that honest minds can honestly disagree. There is ample explanation in this for the situation we are discussing.

The eight judges who gave the majority opinion in this Austro-German case, with the country of their nationality, were: Fromageot (France), Anzilotti (Italy), Rostworowski (Poland), Guerrero (Salvador), Altamira (Spain), Urrutia (Colombia), Negulesco (Rumania), De Bustamante (Cuba). Those of the minority were: Adatci (Japan), Kellogg (United States), Rolin-Jaequemyns (Belgium), Hurst (Great Britain), Schücking (Germany), Van Eysinga (Netherlands), Wang (China). It would wreck the creative fancy of the most jaundiced critic to frame a theory that would explain that grouping on political or national grounds.

Is it the friends of France against the friends of Germany? Well, granted that Poland and Rumania are bound to France by military ties, how did she lose and Germany gain the vote of Belgium, who not only speaks the French language but since the war, of which she was so great a victim, has thrown off her neutrality and made with France a military alliance offensive and defensive? Italy and Spain are not popularly supposed at the moment to be especially Francophile, while I fancy the American judge would be the first to protest that he was not moved to his conclusion by dislike of France or sympathy for Germany.

Is it national interest? Admit, if you choose, that there are countries in Europe who for commercial as well as military reasons of their own would prefer to have Germany and Austria kept apart. Yet what earthly interest has Colombia or Salvador or Cuba in their continued separation? Or, for that matter, what interest have China and Japan in putting them together? And how does it come that, although Spain and Belgium both adhered to the Geneva protocol of 1922 and may both be supposed to desire its absolute observance, a Spanish judge voted with the majority and a Belgian judge on the other side?

Is it racial tendencies—the Latins against the Nordics? If so, whence do the Poles derive their Latin blood or China and Japan their Nordic strain? Is it a clash of legal systems—those schooled under the Roman or civil law on the one side and those under the codes of Germany or Japan or under the common law of England on the other? Hardly, for without stopping to show how impossible it is to apply this classification to the diverse systems of the various countries in question, it is enough to say that the most microscopic analysis of these various opinions would not enable one ignorant of the personality of the author to say under which, if under either, system he was trained.

Finally, does the court speak by sheer weight of numbers or political power? If so, it is curious to observe that the countries supposedly "represented" by the dissenting judges have ten times the political and economic power of those who composed the majority.

I repeat and repeat again that there is but one tenable theory upon which the division of the court can be explained, and that is that these men, conscious of their responsibility and the dignity of their high office, met like judges, listened like judges, deliberated and decided like judges, and—differed like judges. The only explanation that does not involve absurd contradictions and discrepancies is the simple explanation that a hard case was worked out with entire juridical integrity.

An interesting sidelight is thrown upon the close character of the question at issue by the results of a recent inquiry addressed to a group of American judges, professors, deans, and presidents in schools of international law, jurisprudence, and history, requesting their comment on the opinion after a study of it and the pertinent documents. Out of 63 answers returned by these select and competent correspondents, 29 announced their sympathy with the minority in its opinion and 34 with the majority. It is fair to add, by way of emphasis, that of those who thought that the majority had reasoned correctly a number declared themselves in principle none the less in favor of the Anschluss. The proportionate division within this group is singularly like the division in the court itself.

IV

The practical effect of the court's opinion, of course, was merely to return to the council the right to decide the ultimate fate of the proposed customs union. That body had under the treaties the unquestioned power to validate the agreement by giving its consent. As a matter of fact, its consent was never invoked, for two days before the court's opinion appeared Austria and Germany publicly renounced the proposed customs union. What moved them to this step we do not know. Whether their dependence upon amicable financial relations with all their neighbors had become increasingly apparent in the intervening months; whether they no longer wished to challenge the hostile opinion which the publication of the protocol had invoked; whether the difficulties of the arrangement had come to seem more apparent and the advantages less obvious; or whether they sensed the adverse trend of the court itself—all this is matter of pure conjecture.

But although the occasion for the opinion had passed before it came, the outstanding fact remains that a judicial determination of a vexed and dangerous question was achieved in a judicial way. It was a question not only attended by difficulty, but surcharged with deep national feeling. The treaty of Saint-Germain and the first Geneva protocol arose out of the compulsory adjustments and the cruel needs that follow war. The Vienna protocol of last March reflected the not unnatural impulse and desire of Austria and Germany to surmount the disabilities those treaties had imposed. Much of the argument made to the court on Austria's behalf was directed to depicting her difficult situation since the war. Her plight is truly tragic, and it may well be that it calls for some alteration of the treaty of peace. It may also be that, with the knowledge which the years have brought, the treaty would be written differently were it to be written to-day. But these are matters for statesmen, not for courts. The function of the latter, as the judges in the present case clearly perceived, is to declare the scope and effect of the agreements made, leaving to other agencies their alteration or repeal.

Even if the correctness of the court's deliverance through its majority were more doubtful than I suppose it to be, I should still think it a great advance that a question so embroiled had been referred to the court instead of being left to the arbitrament of force as the rival alternative. It is a welcome sign of progress that great nations were willing to submit to the court matters of such vital consequence and reason out their case before it in open argument and debate. The decision of the World Court in the Austro-German case will stand in history for what it is—a decision sound in itself and a milestone on the path to the final reign of law. Whatever criticism or protest it may have evoked to-day will soon be of purely antiquarian interest.

THE FARM PROBLEM—RADIO ADDRESS BY SENATOR WHEELER

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, my colleague the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] a few evenings ago delivered an interesting address over the radio with relation to the farm problem. I ask permission to print it in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The address is as follows:

Ladies and gentlemen of the radio audience, I have been requested by Hon. John A. Simpson, president of the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of America, to speak to you at this hour in his stead upon the farm problem.

It is an intricate subject to handle in the brief time allotted to me as, in it, is involved practically every phase of our whole economic fabric, and I am sure I will not be able to do it as well as the distinguished gentleman whose place I am trying to fill to-day, but Mr. Simpson will speak to you at this hour on the 20th day of January, 1932, and I am sure you will then enjoy a real treat.

There is no one, I am sure, that does not realize that deplorable conditions prevail throughout the length and breadth of our country and that prosperity is not just around the corner or that we are about to do away with our poorhouses in the immediate future.

No one will deny that there must be something radically wrong when millions of our people are hungry because they can get no food, while other millions are bankrupt because they have raised too much food.

For the past 10 years I have been preaching the doctrine that there could be no prolonged prosperity in this country so long as there were 30,000,000 men, women, and children out on the farms of the United States selling their products below the cost of production. To-day the two great money crops of the American farmer, wheat and cotton, are being sold at less than one-third the cost of production. But to talk of the farmers' problem in the manufacturing and financial centers of the East up to quite recently, was to make yourself the butt of the jokester and to be ridiculed as a demagogue.

To-day, however, partially as a result of a continuous lack of the buying power of the 30,000,000 men, women, and children upon the farm, there are 30,000,000 men, women, and children of the laboring classes in our cities that are without purchasing power even equal to the bare necessities of life.

A financial crash took place in Wall Street in 1929—banks have failed and are continually failing—the middle classes of the country have lost their life's savings and notwithstanding the promises made by the industrial leaders of the country, men are thrown out of employment and wages are being reduced all along the line; great industries are going into receiverships or being taken over by their creditors and still there seems to be no end to this so-called slight depression.

Such is the situation that confronted the Congress of the United States when it convened on the 7th of December, 1931.

The industrial and financial depression of the past two years has brought home to us more sharply than anything else that the farm problem is not a local problem of the West or the Middle West or the South but that it is a national question and that we can not have prosperity in this country unless the people living upon the farms are in a position to buy greater and greater amounts of the goods which were formally called luxuries—automobiles radios, as well as the necessities of life manufactured by our mass-producing industries in the East.

However, make no mistake, that is not all that this panic has brought home to the American people. It has awakened them into asking more pertinent questions about our political and economic problems which our so-called leaders in all groups find it difficult to answer.

They are asking questions and asking them with more earnestness than ever before.

What has become of the prophecies of a few months ago that prosperity was just around the corner? Why has not the highest tariff that has ever been passed in our history brought prosperity to our farmers and our factory workers as predicted by our leading statesmen and manufacturers? Nothing was said then about world conditions affecting our markets. The tariff could and would by some magic protect us, as if we were God's chosen people, from the destiny that had befallen the peoples of Europe with their peasant farmer and their unemployed, regardless of world conditions.

What has become of the Federal reserve bank that was to save us from all major depressions in the future? Why should men, women, and children go without clothing, without shelter, and be on the verge of starvation when we have a surplus of wheat, a surplus of clothes, and a surplus of building material? What has become of the promises made by the reactionary politicians and the prophecies made by our leading financiers and industrialists that if business were given a free hand it would and could cure all of our economic ills? And why, after two years of suffering by the masses of the people, has no constructive program been offered to solve the present situation or prevent similar catastrophes in the future?

Why a moratorium on debt payments to European countries when our farmers need one most?

Make no mistake, these and many other perplexing questions must not only be given serious consideration by statesmen but by our business leaders as well.

Thus far the only suggestion that has been made by our national leaders has been to put on a few shingles to patch the roof of our economic structure. Whether the surgeon's knife will be applied to the cancerous growth remains to be seen.

When we reflect that the average net farm income in 1929 was only $887 for a farm family, that in 1930 it had fallen to $598, and that for the year 1931 it will be about $376, we can readily understand why so many factories are idle and millions of wage workers unemployed.

We have heard much about mass production and the benefits of it. I believe in mass production. I do not want to turn the hands of the clock backward—but there is one thing that the great industrial leaders of this country must understand, and that is if mass production is to be successful, the farmer must have money with which to buy the products of mass production and the laborer must get high wages, and both the farmer and the laborer must have some leisure in which to use the products of mass production.

Heretofore in this country our great industrialists, our great financiers, have devoted their time and their attention to production and more production, but seemed to have little heed as to how the farmer was going to buy the products.

Let us now consider some of the problems which confront our agricultural industry.

The mortgaged indebtedness on the farmers of this country increased from $4,000,000,000 in 1910 to more than $8,000,000,000 at the present time. Add to this the farmers' private debts, that are not a matter of public record, and the total indebtedness on which the farmers are paying interest would be not less than $9,000,000,000. If we figure his interest at 5 per cent we find that it amounts to $450,000,000 a year. As the average wheat crop of the United States is only 800,000,000 bushels, and the farmers' price this fall was less than 50 cents a bushel, it will be seen that the total wheat crop for 1931 would pay less than the farmers' interest on his borrowed capital. At 25 cents a bushel, which was all some of the western farmers could get for their wheat this fall, it would take more than two times the entire wheat crop of the United States to pay the farmers' interest on borrowed capital for one year.

But this does not include the farmers' taxes, which amount to many millions of dollars.

In the light of these figures it should be evident to all that the solution of the farm problem can not be brought about by loaning the farmer more money at high rates of interest. The great banking interests of this country may be able to make more money temporarily by loaning money to Europe at high rates of interest instead of helping to finance farmers in this country at low rates of interest but sooner or later they will learn that it probably makes for greater security to help the American farmer than the foreign governments.

I think it is unfair to the farmers to blame them for this mortgage indebtedness.

During the World War the farmers were urged to borrow money for better equipment with which to raise more wheat. The appeal was made to their patriotism and I know personally of stockmen who were coerced and literally forced to borrow money for purchasing tractors and binders in order that they might raise wheat with which to win the war. Many a rancher in the West was accused of being pro-German for hesitating to borrow this easy money with which to enlarge his farm operations. The same accusation was directed against those farmers who were reluctant to mortgage their farms for the purpose of raising money with which to purchase Liberty bonds. Many banks were lending money to the farmers on commission and were selfishly anxious that the farmers should borrow as much as possible. And after loading up the farmers with mortgages or encouraging or even permitting them to become loaded up with mortgages when money was cheap and it was cheap by comparison with the commodities they raised, they were deflated by the actions of the Federal Reserve Board in 1920, were deflated many times more since 1929 until to-day they are expected to pay back money borrowed when it was cheap by money four or five times as dear, measured in commodities. This deflation has destroyed farm values and destroyed the earning power of the farmer but left his indebtedness and taxes as high as before.

Between 1920 and 1925 farm values decreased more than $20,000,000,000. According to census figures, in 1920 the agricultural wealth of the American people was $78,000,000,000. In 1925, according to the farm census, the agricultural wealth of the American people had shrunk to $57,000,000,000, or a loss of $21,000,000,000 in five years.

In 1920 the total invested capital of all mines and quarries in the United States was about $8,000,000,000; the total value of railroads was listed at about $20,000,000,000; the total invested capital in manufacturing was about $44,000,000,000, or a grand total of $72,000,000,000 for the capitalization of all our mines, our railroads, and manufacturing establishments. Our agricultural valuation for 1920 was $78,000,000,000, or $6,000,000,000 more than the combined valuation of the mines, factories, and railroads of the United States.

During this 5-year period from 1920 to 1925, when farm values shrunk $20,000,000,000, the value of mines, railroads, and factories increased in value $25,000,000,000. Is it any wonder that the farmers to-day are crushed with debt and unable to operate successfully?

They are not to blame for the condition in which they find themselves, and it is the duty of the Federal Government to provide a way whereby they can operate with some prospect of economic success.

Unless the Government provides a method of refinancing agriculture, at a low rate of interest, making the dollar cheaper or his products higher so that the farmer can get cost of production, plus a reasonable profit, I can see little hope for a return of prosperity. What the farmer needs, and must have, is a profit on that which he produces rather than new loans, on which he must pay additional interest to the banks.

The amount of taxes paid on farm property increased from about $334,000,000 in 1914 to about $870,000,000 in 1925. This amount has not decreased along with the farmers' income and is now as high or higher than it was in 1925. This is out of all proportion as compared with other forms of taxation and should be reduced by the State legislatures and the local and county authorities.

The tariff is also responsible, in part, for our agricultural distress. For every dollar of benefit the farmers have received from the tariff it has cost them $10. The tariff on steel increases the cost of farm machinery, although farm machinery is on the free list. This tariff on steel is also reflected in the railroad valuations on which the farmers' freight rates are based.

We have built up large industries by manipulations of our economic laws. By erecting high tariff barriers, we have shut out foreign goods and thereby fostered and encouraged monopoly. We have given our financial and industrial leaders a free hand, and they have not been slow in using this advantage to advance their own interests at the expense of the consumers. They approve of political interference with economic laws in the interest and for the benefit of industry, but they deplore such interference in behalf of agriculture and declare it to be economically unsound.

I am one of those who believe that it is not right to bolster up industry through the medium of legislation in violation of the law of supply and demand, but if we are going to bolster up our manufacturing industries in this way, then it follows as night follows day that artificial means must be found to bolster up agriculture. Only in this way can we place agriculture on a parity with industry.

Congress passed several measures the purpose of which was to make the tariff effective on farm products, but they were vetoed by the President. Later, in harmony with the wishes of President Hoover, Congress gave the President authority to appoint a Federal Farm Board and made available for their use the sum of $500,000,000.

I voted against the bill, believing then as I know now that it would be dragged into the political mire and that the politicians and their henchmen rather than the farmers would be the chief beneficiaries of the $500,000,000 appropriated by the Congress of the United States.

No one to-day will gainsay but that the Federal Farm Board was organized along purely political lines with politically minded farm leaders to dominate and control it.

Testimony was recently adduced before the Agricultural Committee of the Senate showing how the heads of the National Grain Corporation, supposedly a cooperative organization for the handling of wheat, were drawing down salaries of $25,000 to as high as $50,000 a year, and that the head of the so-called cooperative organized to handle cotton was drawing down $75,000 a year, while the brokerage firm to whom he gave practically all the business of trading in the cotton of his members drew down the neat sum of $450,000 in one year, while the farmer who raised the cotton drew on an average of $300 per year.

Time does not permit me to go into a discussion of all of the activities of the Farm Board, much as I would like to, but they have suggested that the only way of solving the farm problem was by reducing acreage to a point where there would be no surplus but they, so far as I know, have not indicated just how this very visionary theory can be put into actual practice or how to determine the necessary acreage in advance without first knowing whether it will be a bountiful harvest or a drought.

Personally I am not greatly disturbed about surplus food supplies. What this country needs more than a reduction of the acreage sown in farm crops is an increase in the purchasing power of the consumers of this country.

The program of crop reduction as proposed by the Farm Board places the Government in the rather ludicrous position of spending millions of dollars a year on a Department of Agriculture to teach the farmers how to grow larger and better crops and at the same time spending other millions of dollars through the Federal Farm Board trying to persuade the farmers to raise smaller crops.

If it is the best judgment of the farm leaders that it is necessary to curtail production, some system must be worked out to prorate among the farmers of the country the amount of wheat or cotton which they can sell. This plan, if not too expensive and cumbersome, might work out.

Other legislation has been proposed, such as the so-called equalization-fee plan, for which I voted but with some misgiving as to its workability. Probably the best plan offered has been the so-called debenture plan, but with European countries placing what amounts to embargoes on our wheat I am doubtful of the efficacy of this plan.

Another of the several principal causes of our present economic crisis has been the overcapitalization of our banks, our railroads, our power companies, and many of our manufacturing interests.

It has meant great accumulation of wealth by promoters and bankers, but it has also meant that every time a million or ten million or a hundred million dollars of watered stock—whether paid as dividends or bonuses or sales directly to the suckers who bought it—some one had to help pay dividends upon that watered stock; either it came out of the worker in longer hours and lower pay or out of the farmer or other consumer in the shape of higher prices for commodities, high freight rates, or higher charges for power, or higher interest rates. The promoter got richer at the expense of the consumer and worker. Every time you had a consolidation you had more water. Drastic legislation should be passed to stop this kind of racketeering. We glorify a judge who sentences Al Capone for racketeering, but there are other kinds of racketeering just as destructive of our civilization as that of the Chicago gangster.

It is the judgment of some of our best economists that this unregulated selling of watered and inflated stock to the public, and the collapse which necessarily had to follow in its wake, thereby wiping out the life savings of millions of people, causing banks to close their doors from one end of the country to the other, and thereby cutting off the purchasing power of millions of our people, was one of the major and basic reasons for the economic slump in which we find ourselves to-day.

Bank failures in this country have been caused in a large part first by the plight of agriculture and secondly by the loaning of money on watered or inflated stocks.

In 1923, shortly after the deflation of the farmer started, 491 bank failures occurred in the United States, affecting, I am told, $138,000,000 in deposits; in 1929 there were 643 bank failures with $234,000,000 deposits; and in the first nine months of 1931 there were 1,246 bank failures, affecting $929,000,000 of deposits. These figures should help to explain why the farmers have a so-called surplus while others are going hungry.

The banking system has also failed to stabilize credit and money values. An old farmer in Montana once said to me, "They inflate us in and deflate us out." I think that farmer knew what he was talking about. The only time anyone can borrow money is during times of inflation. If you don't believe that, just try and borrow some money now. And the time when the banker is most anxious to collect his loans is during periods of depression, when it is almost impossible to do so.

Take the farmers as an example. They borrowed money during prosperous times when farm products sold for three and four times what they will bring to-day. In other words, this deflation makes it necessary for the farmer to give at least 300 per cent more bushels of wheat or corn or bales of cotton than would be necessary during a period of inflation. If a woman borrowed from her neighbor in the spring of the year one dozen eggs when their market value was only 25 cents per dozen. I imagine she would object to returning the eggs in the winter when the market value was $1 per dozen.

In like manner the farmer who borrows money in times of inflation to the value of 5,000 bushels of wheat is likely to object to paying back that loan with 15,000 bushels of wheat during a period of deflation. The deflation has the effect of increasing his loan three or four times its former commodity value.

If loans were made as freely in times of depression as in times of inflation, then they would equalize each other and no injustice would be done, but, inasmuch as loans are made only in times of inflation it is only just to the debtor that he should be allowed to pay his debt with money of inflated value.

Only through inflating or making the dollar as cheap as when he borrowed it will the farmer ever be able to get out of debt.

Wageworkers who object to inflation because it increases the cost of living should not forget that inflation will at least put men to work, while a prolonged deflation will in time deprive them of their jobs.

Another evil which directly affects the farmers is the growing tendency toward banker control of industry.

It is impossible to legislate, or obtain in any other manner, permanent prosperity while the wageworkers and farmers lack purchasing power.

When bankers condition their loans to industry upon wage cuts and a directing voice in that industry, they undermine and jeopardize their own interests as well as that of the farmers and wageworkers.

The American people, I hope, will some time demand that our finance and business be conducted in the interest of the people rather than in the interest of the privileged few.

The blame for this depression, and all depressions, rests upon the people who were lulled to sleep while a selfish few were reaping rich rewards—but destroying the goose that laid the golden egg.

There has been nothing to indicate that our great promoters and financial leaders feel any sense of moral obligation to the public. Their viewpoint has rather been this, if the public are boobs enough to buy gold bricks, that's their own lookout. We are not their guardians, nor in any way to blame for their mistakes. That is to some extent true; but perhaps they realize to-day that if we are going to prosper and grow as a great nation and a great people we should, from the standpoint of enlightened selfishness if from no other, realize that prosperity can not be permanently with us unless all classes are provided with money to keep the wheels of commerce going continually.

In conclusion, the remedy for this depression must come along the following lines:

First. An inflation sufficient to enable the farmers and other debtors to return their loans on the commodity value basis on which these debts were contracted. This may be brought about by the remonetization of silver, or by increasing the paper money or possibly by inflation of credit.

Second. Changes in our banking laws that will give protection to bank deposits and stabilize the purchasing value of money.

Third. By lowering our tariffs so that the farmer and other unorganized producers may be upon an equal footing with the manufacturer and promote commerce, good will, and peace throughout the world.

PETITIONS

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, I present resolutions of the Legislature of New Jersey asking that the Volstead Act may be modified by amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolutions will appear in the RECORD and be appropriately referred.

The resolutions were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

CLERK'S OFFICE,
Trenton, N. J.

Second special session committee substitute for Assembly Concurrent Resolution 1

Whereas there is widespread sentiment throughout the Nation toward a change in the Volstead Act so as to legalize the manufacture and sale of light wines and beer; and

Whereas a change in the Volstead Act legalizing the manufacture and sale of light wines and beer will have the effect of saving millions of dollars to the Government and States in enforcing the prohibition laws, and add millions of dollars in revenue to the Government which have been lost since the passage of the prohibition amendment, and would prevent racketeering and general disregard of law: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Assembly of the State of New Jersey (the Senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States of America be, and it is hereby, memorialized to effect such changes in the national prohibition act, commonly known as the Volstead Act, in order to accomplish the foregoing objects and permit those States which desire so to do to have the benefits derived from the legal manufacture and sale of light wines and beer; and be it further

Resolved, That the clerk of the house of assembly be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to transmit a copy of this concurrent resolution to the Members of Congress representing the State of New Jersey.

I certify that the above is a true and official copy of second special session committee substitute for assembly Concurrent Resolution No. 1, adopted by both houses on October 9, 1931.

IMPORTATION OF PULP FROM SWEDEN

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I send to the desk a letter in the form of a petition which I ask to have read, and I should like to say a few words about it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the letter will be read, and the Senator from Washington will be permitted to speak upon it.

The Chief Clerk read the letter, as follows:

SHAFFER BOX CO.,
Tacoma, Wash., December 9, 1931.

Senator C. C. DILL,
United States Senate Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR DILL: The pulp mills of the Pacific Northwest are in a position where they must shut down within the next few months entirely on account of the difference in Swedish currency against the United States currency. These pulp mills in Washington and Oregon employ 2,500 men. At the present time the Swedish exchange is nearly 31 per cent under United States currency. This makes it possible for Swedish pulp (as well as other Scandinavian and German pulp) to come into the eastern and central parts of the United States at a price 31 per cent less than the pulp made in the Pacific Northwest. For instance, in July the price of Swedish unbleached sulphite pulp, delivered in Atlantic coast ports, was $44 per ton. To-day, less than three months, Sweden went off the gold standard, the price is $32 per ton; transposing this $32 United States currency back into the Swedish krona at the present rate of exchange will give them the same net return in Sweden to-day as when they sold their pulp at $44 per ton delivered in the United States at the time their currency was on a par with ours. At the same time, this $32 a ton nets the Pacific coast mills only $25 a ton at their mills, which is a loss of $4 to $7 a ton even on the present day low-wage scale and lowered cost of raw material.

These pulp mills can not exist unless they are at least kept on a parity with the product of foreign pulp mills in this country, and we do not ask that duty be put on, only that a fine be levied by the Customs Department sufficient to take up the difference in the exchange at the time of shipment of foreign pulp.

We are at a loss to know whether President Hoover, in his message to Congress bearing on the tariff, making pointed reference to the temporary abandonment of the gold standard and the power of the Tariff Commission to remedy, believes that this remedy would be legally possible on goods that have no duty under the present tariff.

Will you be so kind as to assist the pulp industry of the Pacific Northwest by attempting to force a ruling from the Tariff Commission on this, and failing in this, could you get an immediate relief in an amendment to the tariff act through the present Congress.

Sincerely,

RALPH SHAFFER.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The letter will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I have had this letter read into the RECORD because it illustrates a development that is becoming more and more serious in connection with our domestic as well as our foreign trade. The 31 per cent inflation of currency in Europe has lowered the cost of production of those products that come to this country from Europe. Thus the cheaper currency of Europe and of the Asiatic countries operates not only against our foreign trade but begins to operate against our domestic trade.

There is no tariff on pulp, and to place a tariff on pulp would afford but a temporary protection, because as soon as the money of other countries was inflated to a point greater than it now is our tariff would again be ineffective.

This condition is just another illustration of the absolute necessity of our Government's getting on such a money basis that the money of the world will be standardized on a common valuation scale. I introduced a bill a few days ago providing for a monetary committee that would meet with the representatives of other nations, with a view to establishing a basis of world exchange, and using silver as one of the bases of exchange. I call attention to this pulp industry as an illustration of the beginning of what will happen in this country to our domestic trade unless we do something to get the money of the world on a basis that will be common to all nations.

Anybody who knows anything at all about foreign exchange knows that the depreciation of the value of European currencies is acting as a more effective tariff wall against our shipments to European countries than any tariff that was ever conceived. Our Republican friends, in defending the present tariff, tell us that two-thirds of the imports into this country have no tariff levied against them. The President in referring to the new English tariff stated that it only applied to a few of our products; but a decrease in the value of the Englich currency, the Scandinavian currency, or the Japanese currency, and the corresponding deflation of values act as a complete tariff wall against everything that we attempt to ship to those countries, and as their currencies become less and less valuable their tariff walls become higher and higher against our shipments of products into their countries.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. DILL. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FLETCHER. Does the same thing not apply as to Canada as well?

Mr. DILL. The same thing applies to Canada as well, although Canada has not yet deflated her currency so badly as have the European countries. I think that yesterday Canadian exchange was about 18 per cent off. Whether Canada has yet actually left the gold standard is rather hard to determine, although the newspapers on Sunday stated that within 10 days she would leave the gold standard.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. KING. The statement has been made within the past few days by responsible authorities in Canada that, notwithstanding the depreciation referred to, Canada does not intend to leave the gold standard; but it is obvious that with so many European countries having left the gold standard and England having left the gold standard, Canada will be compelled, sooner or later, to follow that course.

Mr. DILL. Regardless of whether she leaves the gold standard or not, the fact is that her money is at 18 per cent depreciation right now.

Mr. KING. Measured in gold?

Mr. DILL. Measured by gold.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senate from New Jersey?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. KEAN. Is not the point the Senator makes equivalent to saying that the fall in the franc, the fall in the pound, and the fall in the mark mean a cut in the wages of the people of Great Britain and the people of the other European countries, and also mean a lowering of the tariff of the United States?

Mr. DILL. Absolutely, that is the result, and it is the result not only as to the products covered by tariff rates, but it is the result as to the commodities that did not need a tariff previous to the cut in the value of wages and the cost of production abroad.

Mr. KEAN. Is my distinguished friend speaking for a higher tariff?

Mr. DILL. No; I am not, because a higher tariff would be but a temporary remedy. We have too many high-tariff walls now. The high-tariff walls which we erected by the Smoot-Hawley law resulted in retaliatory tariffs all over the world, and what little foreign trade there was is fast being destroyed by our high tariff law. While an increased tariff might temporarily help the situation, just as soon as the currency of foreign countries is deflated to a greater extent we shall have to have another raise in tariff, until after a while nobody will be able to trade at all with anybody else. The real remedy is not to be found in tariff walls, but is to be found in placing the money of the various nations of the world on an equal-value basis, and then having more currency for the use of the world by enlarging the basis of currency by including silver on a monetary basis along with gold.

MORTGAGE FORECLOSURES BY FEDERAL LAND BANKS

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I have here a letter in the nature of a petition from Mr. N. L. Flournoy, of Millington, Tenn., in reference to the foreclosure of mortgages by Federal land banks. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the letter in the nature of a petition was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, without all the signatures, as follows:

MILLINGTON, TENN., December 12, 1931.

Hon. KENNETH D. MCKELLAR,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Realizing that you have always shown a disposition to help the common people, I am taking the liberty to address you in behalf of those unfortunate people (farmers) who were compelled to mortgage their homes and farms to the Federal land bank to get some financial relief, and now that they have fallen upon evil days (floods, drought, and price of farm products below cost of production) their farms are being sold for the lack of their ability to pay the interest on the said mortgage loans.

Every county paper you take up has therein ads for the foreclosure on some poor man's farm, and, of course, it will go to some one at a bargain, thereby breaking up for good this man's lifetime efforts and accumulations.

Something should be done, and done quickly, to stay the hand of our otherwise good Government. A halt should be called on such steps being taken when there is no avenue of help open to the farmer during these desperate and trying times.

A person of your broad vision can very readily see that if this course is not adjusted to the financial exigencies of the present times, a very serious and irreparable condition will prevail with the unfortunate landowners.

With sincere regards and appreciation, I beg to remain, Respectfully,

N. L. FLOURNOY.

All of our citizens approve this, and a few seen, gladly signed across the back of this letter.

We approve of this appeal.

C. A. JAMISON, Assistant Postmaster.

PROPOSED CASH BONUS TO VETERANS

Mr. McKELLAR. I present a letter from Marion J. Gray, of Fayetteville, Tenn., together with a petition inclosed by him, praying that Congress may take action regarding the payment of the balance of the soldiers' bonus. I ask that the letter and petition may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The letter and petition were referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD without all the signatures, as follows:

FAYETTEVILLE, TENN., October 3, 1931.

Hon. KENNETH D. MCKELLAR,
Memphis, Tenn.

DEAR SEATOR MCKELLAR: I am inclosing herewith a petition requesting that Congress take action at the coming session regarding payment of the balance of the soldiers' bonus.

There are about 500 ex-service men in Lincoln County. Out of all the men I got to see there were only four that refused to sign this petition. I think it is only necessary to mention that these four men, three of which I know had sufficient reason for not desiring to sign same, aside from the fact that they all were the possessors of good incomes, are all already well fixed financially.

I did not get to see all the men, although you can see that the percentage of those refusing to sign the petition is negligible.

The Legion in Detroit voted against it. The Legion, as a whole, did not get a chance to vote on it. The delegates voted like they wanted to vote without the little fellow having a chance to vote.

The Government can borrow all it wants at 1¾ and 2 per cent, yet it charges us 4½ per cent on our own money. It doesn't charge any foreign country over 3 or 3½ per cent on loans. It canceled Germany's war debt for a year running into millions. The country we went to France to fight—an enemy—gets theirs given to them voluntarily and we have to fight to get what rightly belongs to us.

During the war men at home got from $10 to $25 a day for their work and enjoyed life while we were fighting for $1 a day and half enough to eat. All railroads and industries that the Government took over were put back in good shape, and they were paid well in cash for their use, and we human targets got a little insurance for our service payable in 20 years.

When we were leaving for France everyone told us that, when we got back, there was nothing that would be too good for us. Back slappers were shaking hands with us, telling us what they would do for us when we came back; and to-day those same back slappers and handshakers are the ones that are fighting to keep us from having what rightly belongs to us.

Senator MCKELLAR, I was 14 years old when I went in the Army in 1917. When I was 16 I had been to France and back. I am 28 years of age and I am taking the responsibility of writing you this letter with the backing of my comrades. We, as a whole, ask you to do all in your power toward procuring favorable action by Congress regarding the soldiers' bonus.

We also take occasion at this time to thank you for all of your efforts in the past devoted to procuring favorable legislation for the ex-service men. We have followed closely your utterances as given in the press and assure you of our deep interest and appreciation of same.

Again thanking you for what you have already done and what we feel sure you will continue to do in the future, I remain,
Your respectfully,

MARION J. GRAY.

We, the undersigned ex-service men of Fayetteville and Lincoln County, Tenn., hereby request Congress to enact a law giving ex-service men of the World War the balance of the adjusted compensation (bonus).

MARION J. GRAY AND OTHERS.

WIDOWS AND ORPHANS OF VETERANS

Mr. McKELLAR. I present a letter in the nature of a petition from Mrs. W. R. Altom, president of the American Legion Auxiliary, Department of Tennessee, favoring the passage of the so-called widows and orphans' bill presented by the American Legion. I ask that the letter may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the letter in the nature of a petition was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD without all the signatures, as follows:

AMERICAN LEGION AUXILIARY, DEPARTMENT OF TENNESSEE,
December 15, 1931.

Senator K. D. MCKELLAR,
Washington, D. C.

OUR DEAR SENATOR: We, as presidents and secretaries of the American Legion Auxiliary units of East Tennessee, are very much interested in the welfare of all wives and children of the ex-service men.

Therefore, we are extremely interested in the passage of the widows and orphans' act as will be presented by the American Legion.

Will you please write us your attitude toward the passage of this bill. Send your reply to Mrs. James A. Greene, Johnson City, Tenn., post-office box 674.

Assuring you of our deep appreciation of your assistance, we are,
Most sincerely,

MRS. W. R. ALTOM, President.
MRS. JAS. A. GREENE, Secretary.

COTTON PRODUCTION STATISTICS

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, a few days ago the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] called attention to the dropping off of the exports from this country. Much has been said in committee rooms and throughout the trade generally as to the encroachment on the world's cotton market by foreign nations. The Senator from Nevada also called attention to the price levels at which our commodities have been sold.

At my request the Department of Commerce prepared some tables showing the actual production of commercial cotton in foreign countries. I desire to have the tables printed in the RECORD. I also ask to have printed in the RECORD a table showing the amount of exports and domestic consumption of American cotton for 30 years and the average price at which cotton has been sold during that period.

These tables, I think, will be of very great interest to the Agricultural Committee in its forthcoming investigation.

I also have a photostatic copy of a table showing the average production over a period of five years of cotton in foreign countries by specified staple lengths. Much has been said about the improvement in Indian and in Russian cotton. I present these tables, with the letters of transmittal, because they bear out that which I have maintained all along, that, so far as the encroachment on our market or the world's market by foreign cotton is concerned, it is a fabrication by those who, in my opinion, desire to affect the American market by virtue of giving out that kind of propaganda.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SMITH. I do.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Is long-staple cotton raised in South Carolina?

Mr. SMITH. It is.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Is the Senator able to advise the Senate whether or not there has been an increase or a falling off of imports of long-staple cotton?

Mr. SMITH. That information is included in the tables, and the Senator can get it from them. I do not think the falling off of importations into this country has been appreciable. The fact of the matter is that in the confused and distressed condition which seems to be prevalent throughout the world the premium between the ordinary variety and the long-staple cotton has—for what reason I do not know—come to a point where it is practically negligible.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The Senator will recall that all types of cotton were on the free list and that when we enacted the last tariff act we placed long-staple cotton on the protected list at 7 cents a pound.

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I assume the Senator is aware that application has been made to the Tariff Commission to reduce that rate. I telegraphed the commission requesting that no hearings be had without those of us who were interested in maintaining that rate being given notice and an opportunity to be heard. If it be proper, I should like to have inserted in the RECORD immediately following the documents offered by the Senator from South Carolina two resolutions adopted by cotton organizations of California protesting against any reduction of the present rate of duty on long-staple cotton, a commodity in which California is very deeply interested.

Mr. SMITH. I was of the opinion that, on account of the small quantity of real long-staple cotton produced in California and parts of Arizona—that is, cotton which would compete with the Egyptian cotton—perhaps a tariff might result in bringing about a higher price, but the same thing, in my opinion, has happened in the case of long-staple cotton that happened in the case of wheat.

The producers of long-staple cotton, having no financial resources and no compact sales organization, were compelled to take the price the buyer offered, just as the action of Congress in putting a duty of 42 cents a bushel on wheat, the wheat producers competing with each other, was worse than a gesture; it was almost an insult to the wheat producers, because the price went down practically more than 40 cents a bushel. Why? Because the wheat producer, unlike the ordinary industrial organization, had no resources; he had no financial surplus, and was not in a position to hold his commodity for the market and distribute it in America at the protected price and then sell his surplus abroad at the world's price. He was compelled, on the contrary, to take what the buyer offered. That is the condition with cotton. A duty of 7 cents a pound may be levied on cotton, but the buyers give what they please. The fact is that now I do not think long-staple cotton is bringing much more than the amount of the tariff which has been levied. I know, I sold some that did not average much over 7 cents a pound.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. If the Senator will pardon me, I do not care now to enter into a discussion of conditions or why prices have fallen or the effect of the 7-cent duty placed upon long-staple cotton, but I will ask the Senator and the Senate if they will be good enough to read the resolutions to which I have referred, which will, perhaps, in part, afford an explanation of the low price of long-staple cotton.

In any event, I will say to the Senator from South Carolina, if I may address him, it will be recalled that Senators representing cotton States, and particularly those States which raise the highest grade, or the long-staple cotton, were then, and I assume are still, in favor of maintaining the rate which we placed on long-staple cotton after thorough investigation and thoughtful consideration. I do not want the Tariff Commission to proceed with hearings on that point without giving us due and proper notice.

Mr. SMITH. I think that is proper.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the request of the Senator from South Carolina will be granted.

The tables and letters of transmittal presented by Mr. SMITH and ordered printed in the RECORD are as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
BUREAU OF THE CENSUS,
Washington, December 15, 1931.

Hon. ELLISON D. SMITH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In compliance with your telephone request there is inclosed a tabular statement showing the production of commercial cotton in the several foreign countries for each crop from 1910 to 1930, inclusive.

As you know, the weight of the bale in the several countries differs very materially. The quantities have been converted into equivalent bales of 478 pounds lint.

There is inclosed a photostat copy of Table 1 of Miscellaneous Publication 104, United States Department of Agriculture. This table shows the approximate quantities of the several lengths of cotton produced in each of the countries. There is also inclosed a copy of a memorandum prepared by the textile division of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce entitled "Varieties of Cotton Grown in Foreign Countries." This memorandum is a general description of the production in all of the foreign countries which produce cotton. This memorandum and the photostat copy should give a pretty good idea of the character of foreign-grown cotton.

Very truly yours,

W. M. STEUART, Director.

The Division of Cotton Marketing has received samples of 1 1/16-inch cotton from Egypt which shows that some cotton is below 1⅛ inches, but has no information on quantity.
[7] This classification of Indian cotton according to staple lengths is based on Liverpool interpretations and may vary from a classification based on the official standards of the United States for length of staple.

Compiled from official sources, from International Institute of Agriculture, from information based on samples of foreign cotton received by the Division of Cotton Marketing of the Bureau of Agricultural Economics, and from unofficial trade reports.

Because of differences in description of cottons for length of staple in the reporting countries, it is not certain that the distributions here shown have been uniformly made nor that they are comparable with cottons classed under the official standards of the United States for length of staple. Distributions are subject to revision on the basis of further work on the classification of cotton of foreign growths.

BUREAU OF THE CENSUS,
Washington, December 10, 1931.

Hon. ELLISON D. SMITH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In compliance with your telephone request there are furnished the following figures of American cotton consumed in the United States and exported for cotton years from 1906 to 1931, inclusive. The quantities are shown in running bales, counting round as half bales. Separate statistics of linters consumed and exported are not available for some of the earlier years. Accordingly, the statistics of consumption for 1906, 1907, and 1908, and of exports for 1906 to 1913, inclusive, include some linters.

TARIFF RATE ON LONG-STAPLE COTTON

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I offer and request that there be printed in the RECORD the resolutions adopted by the board of directors of the Fresno County (Calif.) Chamber of Commerce, urging that the present rate on long-staple cotton, as fixed by the tariff act of 1930, namely, 7 cents a pound on cotton of 1⅛ inches and better, be maintained, and no decrease authorized, and further petitioning the United States Tariff Commission that the said rate of duty on long-staple cotton be kept in force. I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution

Whereas realizing that the stocks of imported cotton have diminished to a point whereby the American producer of staple cotton will soon be able to receive the premiums he is entitled to for his efforts to produce superior quality of cotton, the Fresno County Chamber of Commerce, representing hundreds of growers of cotton who produced staple of 1⅛ inches and better, do petition to the United States Tariff Commission that the tariff act of 1930, section 336, carrying an import duty of 7 cents a pound on cotton of 1⅛ inches and better, be kept in force; and

Whereas the growers of this district used to receive a premium of from 2 to 4 cents per pound above market quotation, due to the quality and staple of their cotton, which for several years past has not been obtainable, due, in a great extent, to the importation of cotton; and

Whereas the effect of this tariff schedule is just beginning to have its effect on domestic cottons in aiding the cotton growers to attain a fair premium on their longer staple lengths, the tariff not having affected this premium due to the accumulation of imported stock prior to the action of the tariff, and the stocks now being down to a point where domestic cotton is affected, we feel that it is only fair that the tariff remain in force long enough to measure its effectiveness as far as the producer is concerned and any hardships that manufacturers claim; and

Whereas the Fresno County Chamber of Commerce is especially interested in protesting a decrease in the tariff, because 60 per cent or more of the California cotton crop last year was of 1 3/32-inch staple or longer: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the board of directors of the Fresno County Chamber of Commerce, in regular session in Fresno, Calif., this 18th day of November, 1931, representing all of the cotton growers of this district, do hereby urge that you give your earnest attention to the above-mentioned tariff in seeing that it is maintained at the present duty, and not decreased; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to Senators and congressional Representatives of California, Arizona, and New Mexico; Chester Gray, Washington representative of the American Farm Bureau Federation; and to the secretary of the Tariff Commission, Washington, D. C.

Adopted at a regular meeting of the board of directors of the Fresno County Chamber of Commerce, November 18, 1931.

TREFFLE R. LA SENAY,
Executive Secretary.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I also present a letter addressed to me from the Kern County Chamber of Commerce, Bakersfield, Calif., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered printed in the RECORD.

BAKERSFIELD, CALIF., November 14, 1931.

The Hon. SAMUEL M. SHORTRIDGE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR SHORTRIDGE: At a regular meeting of the board of directors of the Kern County Chamber of Commerce, held at Bakersfield, Calif., Tuesday evening, November 10, 1931, the following resolution was passed:

"Whereas realizing that the stocks of imported cotton have diminshed to a point whereby the American producer of staple cotton will soon be able to receive the premiums he is entitled to for his efforts to produce superior quality of cotton, the Kern County Chamber of Commerce, representing hundreds of growers of cotton who produced staple of 1⅛ inch and better, do petition to the United States Tariff Commission that the tariff act of 1930, section 336, carrying an import duty of 7 cents a pound on cotton of 1⅛ inch and better be kept in force; and

"Whereas the growers of this district used to receive a premium of from 2 to 4 cents per pound above market quotation, due to the quality and staple of their cotton, which for several years past has not been obtainable, due, in a great extent, to the importation of cotton; and

"Whereas the effect of this tariff schedule is just beginning to have its effect on domestic cottons in aiding the cotton grower to attain a fair premium on their longer staple lengths, the tariff not having affected this premium, due to the accumulation of imported stock prior to the action of the tariff, and the stocks now being down to a point where domestic cotton is affected, we feel that it is only fair that the tariff remain in force long enough to measure its effectiveness as far as the producer is concerned and any hardships that manufacturers claim; and

"Whereas the Kern County Chamber of Commerce is especially interested in protesting a decrease in the tariff because 60 per cent or more of the California cotton crop last year was of 1 3/32 inches staple or longer: Therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the board of directors of the Kern County Chamber of Commerce, in regular session in Bakersfield, Calif., this 10th day of November, 1931, representing all of the cotton growers of this district, do hereby urge that you give your earnest attention to the above-mentioned tariff in seeing that it is maintained at the present duty and not decreased."

Yours respectfully,

L. B. NOURSE,
Secretary Kern County Chamber of Commerce.

SYMPOSIUM OF VIEWS OF CERTAIN GOVERNORS RELATIVE TO THE ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

Mr. VANDENBERG. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Commerce Committee a summary of the views of the governors of 10 Central and far Western States pleading for the speedy conclusion of the prospectus for the St. Lawrence waterway. Most of these governors appeared in person at a recent meeting in Chicago where a so-called council of States prayed for earliest possible action upon this gigantic undertaking which would open the landlocked heart of the Nation to the commerce of the oceans. It is the greatest adventure since Roosevelt bisected Panama. It is the greatest single public improvement that could be put in work at the present time. It is the greatest practical instrumentality for farm relief. These gubernatorial opinions are particularly timely, because we are given to understand that a treaty between the United States and Canada for the completion of the St. Lawrence waterway is fast approaching conclusion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statements were referred to the Committee on Commerce, as follows:

OHIO

By Hon. George White, Governor of Ohio

Of all the natural bounties bestowed upon mankind by a kindly providence, none exceeds in significance the Great Lakes of North America. This chain of connecting inland seas in the very heart of the continent has been vital to its history and will be vital to its destiny. Exploration and settlement followed this waterway. Vast commerce floats upon its surface and marvelous industrial development clusters about its shores. It constitutes the natural basis for every system of transportation throughout the Middle West. It has drawn a civilization to its borders.

But thus far its utility has been essentially local to America. Deep-water transportation to harbors beyond the seas has been broken by obstacles in the channel of the St. Lawrence. It is now proposed that the coordinated might of the United States and of Canada be exerted to remove those obstacles. What a fitting sequel to the policy of peace we have pursued for a hundred years!

The advantages which will flow from this accomplishment are beyond all calculation. Lake ports will become seaports. In terms of freight haulage, Toronto and Buffalo, Cleveland and Chicago will be nearer to Europe than is New York. Ocean-going vessels from the Orient will discharge their cargies upon the shore of Minnesota. A veritable "northwest passage" will become a reality.

Much of this titanic project is already accomplished. Its completion depends upon the successful negotiation of a treaty between the United States and Canada.

Every consideration of statesmanship dictates the seizure of this opportunity to benefit multiplied millions of people. The immediate undertaking of the work will help to lift the depression now. Its completion will prolong its benefits for generations to come.

The resources of America have been developed by men of vision; men who could see the empire rising in the wilderness; men of iron wills and sturdy hands. To such men this project must appeal. An undertaking so typical of American enterprise must fire the mind of every man of action. Its promise stirs the imagination of the people.

In a world suffering from the tragic results of national animosities and discords there comes to us this opportunity to demonstrate the benefits of international cooperation.

In behalf of the people of Ohio, I join with our neighboring States and with our brethren from Canada in bespeaking the early consummation of this beneficent undertaking.

MICHIGAN

By Hon. Wilber M. Brucker, Governor of Michigan

Nothing would strike the present sluggish economic situation with more dynamic impact right at this moment than the completion of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway. It would act as an economic blood transfusion to renew circulation in the body politic. It would not only be a psychic stimulant but would invigorate the whole of North America as well by the establishment of new world trade routes. It would furnish the element of physical improvement which would literally compel the kind of confidence that commands prosperity. To Michigan and some of her sister States the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence completion means more than any Government undertaking ever before proposed in this country's history.

For decades now men of vision on both sides of the international boundary line have dreamed of the completion of this great highway of commerce down the St. Lawrence to the Atlantic. They have envisoned ports of the Great Lakes being opened to vessels of all nations, making it possible for the commerce of the Great Lakes and all that vast territory commercially tributary to be carried to ports of the world. They have followed their belief through all its successful engineering phases, with the resultant knowledge that the commerce of the Great Lakes region may be carried in American bottoms without transshipment to all parts of the world. They have been undaunted throughout the maze of diplomatic negotiations until to-day they have come to the period of realization that the Atlantic can be served 2,000 miles inland to make ocean ports of Chicago, Detroit, Milwaukee, Duluth, Toledo, Cleveland, Buffalo, and countless others, and that 87 per cent of all ocean-going ships will be able to drop anchor in the ports of the Great Lakes and connecting waters.

The Great Lakes-St. Lawrence is the largest connected body of fresh water on the globe. Its combined area exceeds 90,000 square miles from Duluth to tidewater at Montreal. Twenty-three States of the Union are commercially tributary to it, in addition to its great Canadian interest. The shore line of the Great Lakes and islands exceeds 8,000 miles, of which 2,200 miles are within the State of Michigan. The Great Lakes constitute the greatest highway of water-borne commerce, except the high seas, in the world. Without the St. Lawrence River development a normal year sees 200,000,000 tons of commerce, worth $1,500,000,000, moved to market by water transportation on the Great Lakes. The commerce carried on the Great Lakes exceeds by 50,000,000 tons the total annual coastwise commerce of the United States carried on the oceans. Thirteen and eight-tenths of the total foreign commerce of the United States is carried on over the Great Lakes.

There are more than 400 harbors on the Great Lakes and their connecting waters, of which approximately 100 have been improved by the Federal Government at a cost of more than $90,000,000. About 300 other harbors have been improved by local governmental agencies and private enterprise. Millions more have been expended by the Federal Government in the construction and operation of the locks between Lakes Superior and Huron, through which passes more tonnage each year than through the Panama Canal, Suez Canal, Kiel Canal, or the Manchester Ship Canal.

This whole central inland area has been awaiting the blasting out of the key log in the jam blocking direct traffic to world markets by way of the St. Lawrence. No part of the country can be prevented from the full realization of its natural possibilities with resultant benefit to the rest of the country. The establishment of trade balances in favor of this inland empire of 22 States can not fail ultimately to redound to the common good of all the States. No section can afford to oppose that which will eventually work out for the common good.

SOUTH DAKOTA

By Hon. Warren Green, Governor of South Dakota

South Dakota needs the St. Lawrence waterway because it will give us both convenience and profit in marketing our farm products, which is almost our only means of getting wealth into the State.

It means a convenience because our elevator capacity is only about 27,000,000 bushels and in a normal year we export about 120,000,000 bushels, so our elevators will be filled about four times. We must have transportation responsive to our needs.

In a casual year about 150,000 freight cars, or 5,000 train loads of 30 cars each, are necessary to move the farm products which we export from our State. If this marketing were carried by one train, the engine would be nosing into the freight yards of Chicago, the heavily loaded cars would stretch across northern Illinois, across the long dimension of Iowa, across the still greater distance of South Dakota, and the caboose would be over in the oil fields of Wyoming getting oil for the axles of this 1,135-mile train. Our production nearly all goes east. Almost the entire exports of grain and meats go to the mills and packing plants toward the east and into the established channels of trade.

Four lines of railroad are fairly direct to Lake Superior and five nearly direct to Lake Michigan. For convenience we must have both the quick service which railroads give and the cheap service that water transportation can give.

As a matter of profit, we must be able to market in competition with other agricultural areas producing similar products. We find that a mile on the freight train is about equal to 10 miles in cost on the ocean freighter. The world is so organized now that commerce must enter our calculations. We know that the average seaport for our competitors in Argentine and Australia is less than 250 miles from the farm, while we are about 1,600 miles from the seaport. We know that European farmers can deliver their potatoes at less expense in New York or any other coastal city than we can, while we grow the best potatoes in the country. If we take the rate from New York to Liverpool as the yardstick for measurement, we in the capital of South Dakota, at the exact center of the North American continent, are, for the purpose of shipment, just about 25,000 miles, or the entire distance around the world, from New York. In other words, the present cost of shipping a bushel of grain from Pierre, S. Dak., to New York is equivalent to the cost of shipping it around the world if the water rate from New York to Liverpool is used as a basis.

Our best estimates are that we could just about pay the interest annually on the entire investment which the United States will make in building the seaway down the St. Lawrence out of the increased profits of the South Dakota farmers.

MINNESOTA

By Hon. Floyd B. Olson, Governor of Minnesota

The basic industry of the Middle West is agriculture. The prosperity of that section depends upon the buying power of food. In other words, from the standpoint of an amateur economist, the buying power of food determines our prosperity. The farmer of the Middle West is handicapped by being obliged to pay a high rate of transportation on his produce, which cuts down the amount he receives and being obliged to pay a high transportation rate for the commodities he buys from the East, thus raises his cost of production and operation. He first pays in heavy freight rates in order to bring his products—at least his surplus products—to market. Then again on the commodities which are not manufactured in the West he pays a heavy transportation charge in order to get them.

I would not attribute the depression of the mid-west farmer to the Esch-Cummins law, but since the passage of that law, with the increase of freight rates which affected the Middle West, particularly because of the long haul and other economic factors and governmental activities, the farmer became depressed. We in the cities of the Mid West believe that our economic trend is going to follow whatever trend there is in agriculture.

While wheat does not compare, in money receipts, with the dairy products of the Middle West, yet it is and always has been a sort of economic bellwether as to prices. In other words, the prices of farm commodities and, to some extent, the prices of manufactured commodities, follow the market price of wheat up or down.

The development of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway would permit the transportation of wheat to the foreign markets by as much as 10 cents a bushel less than the present rail and sea rate. That would mean a tremendous increase in income to agriculture through the increased revenue from wheat, with its consequent effect upon other commodities.

It is an established fact that water transportation will cheapen the cost he pays to get products and will cheapen the cost he pays upon the commodities he ships to world markets. The seaway will be of incalculable value to the farmer. It will increase his buying power and his buying power will not only be manifested in the purchase of manufacturing products but it will extend gradually to the seaboard.

It would also develop industry in the Middle West, which has declined 50 per cent in Minnesota in the last 10 years, so that the producers would be able to purchase manufactured articles at considerably less than the present prevailing market price.

That about expresses the viewpoint of a great many people, particularly in my own State. Cheaper rates on what the farmer buys—cheaper rates on what he sells—and an opportunity to dispose of his surplus on a firmer basis in world markets than he now has on the rail route.

ILLINOIS

By Hon. L. L. Emmerson, Governor of Illinois

No Commonwealth can be more interested in the success of these efforts than my own State of Illinois. Chicago to-day is one of the great ports of the world, but it is destined to take a great leap forward on the day that the first deep-draft ocean-going vessel sails down the St. Lawrence, and through the lake system, to weigh anchor here.

The States of the upper Mississippi Valley form the greatest food-producing region in the world, and to-day's production could be multiplied many times if markets were available. Bringing of ocean-going vessels to our doors, putting us on a basis of equality with seaboard States in the competition for world markets, will more than any other factor settle the farm problem which is now pressing us for solution. Production of grain in the region which would be influenced by the St. Lawrence waterway system amounts to more than 3,600,000,000 bushels a year.

If this great section is to continue to export grain, it must be able to meet competitive world prices. That competition can not and must not be met by reduction in farm labor costs, but it can be met in the cost of carrying the products of our farms to the world's market centers.

Engineers and statisticians have estimated that the St. Lawrence waterway would save about 10 cents a bushel on the cost of transporting grain. If only one-half of this amount should accrue to the producers, the American farmer would benefit to the amount of $150,000,000 yearly.

It is well recognized that the price of our crops is set by the price of crop surpluses. It has been generally urged that production be decreased to wipe out these surpluses. If we can increase prices through reduction in marketing costs, the same end will have been achieved without recourse to artificial methods.

While maintaining its agricultural wealth, the great mid-West has become one of the most important industrial sections of the entire world. Our mammoth industries have been developed in spite of the handicap which we suffer, in competition for world trade. Our own State of Illinois produces annually five and one-half billion dollars' worth of manufactured products, being exceeded only by New York and Pennsylvania. To maintain those markets, which we have won, and at the same time develop others, demands not only the most improved production methods but improved distribution methods.

Growing markets mean more jobs, and more jobs mean increased spending power and less want. It requires no stretch of imagination to vision a new era of increased prosperity for the territory along the St. Lawrence and Great Lakes upon the completion of this improvement in which we are all so vitally interested. Its attainment may be hurried through the unselfish cooperation of benefiting communities.

INDIANA

By Hon. Harry G. Leslie, Governor of Indiana

The Calumet area is the industrial center of America. Indiana has some 40 miles of lake frontage on the southern end of Lake Michigan, which reaches down into the heart of the richest area in the world. While the lake frontage is small, it is the most important harbor project on Lake Michigan. East Chicago's port of Indiana Harbor, the adjacent port of Buffington, and the harbor of Gary have a water-borne commerce that not only takes first place among Lake Michigan port facilities but compares favorably with many of the great ports on the Atlantic and Pacific and, according to the latest available figures of the War Department, outranks all harbors on the Gulf coast, including that of New Orleans. Mention should be made here of the projected Port William between Gary and Michigan City, which, with the return of industrial activity, will rival the older harbors in facilities and the amount of commerce clearing there.

Numerous trunk-line railroads touch this area, and many of the great motor-vehicle highways center here. To have available the Lakes-to-Gulf waterway will make possible even far greater shipping advantages. There has been a steady and continuously increasing volume of industry in this area. When assured that the St. Lawrence waterway will be available in the near future, we can reasonably expect a much greater development in the future than has existed in the past.

The vast volume of domestic traffic moving between the West and East will be vitally affected. Pacific lumber now moves by the Panama Canal to the Atlantic seaboard and back west as far as Indiana. Copper moves to Puget Sound via the Panama Canal to eastern seaboard. It could easily go by rail to Duluth, thence by water to the Great Lakes and canal to the Atlantic seaboard. Brazilian coffee, Yucatan sisal, East India rubber could all move in bulk from origin to destination at Great Lakes ports upon the completion of this project.

From the experience of other nations in the construction of ship canals there can be no reasonable doubt as to the advantages of the proposed canal but as to the absolute necessity of it. England spent hundreds of millions of dollars to bring Manchester to the sea, and her greatness is largely due to her overseas commerce. Germany, through the Kiel Canal and a network of waterways that connect her industrial centers with the sea, has conclusively demonstrated the vital importance of bringing the sea to her manufacturing centers in order to enable them to compete for the markets of the world.

This project brings sea-going ships to the center of industry, it reaches the richest agricultural region of the world, it brings the world markets a thousand miles closer to the sources of production, it cheapens the cost of transportation both domestic and foreign. Its immediate construction is of vital importance to the economic life of the greater part of our country and should be hastened with the greatest possible speed.

MONTANA

By Hon. J. E. Erickson, Governor of Montana

It is not my purpose to attempt to advance new arguments or reasons for the construction of the proposed Great Lakes and St. Lawrence shipway. It seems that everyone East and West is agreed that a water route connecting the Great Lakes with the sea is essential to the progress and well-being of the great Northwest and indeed of the entire country.

My only excuse in traveling from the far-off Montana to meet with you is to emphasize as strongly as possible the intense interest our people feel in the proposed shipway and their earnest desire that this project be constructed as soon as it is possible to do so, and also to assure you of our hearty cooperation in promoting this enterprise.

Some one has said that the two great problems of civilization are production and an adequate system of distribution of the products of labor and industry. We have gone a long way towards the solution of the problem of production. We have not been so successful in solving the problem of distribution. Scientific methods of farming have enabled the farmer to greatly increase the yield of his land, and the introduction of machinery and labor-saving devices has enabled him to extend the scope of his operation so that mass production is now enjoyed by the tiller of the soil as well as by the great industries of the country. As a result, in the present unhappy condition of the country, we find ourselves with vast surpluses of wheat, cotton, and other agricultural products, and the same is true of our industries. They are curtailing production because there is no market for the products at the mills and factories, and yet there are millions in China, India, and other countries who are starving and perishing for want of commodities which are so plentiful in the world. Even in our own country millions of citizens are crowding the bread lines and are forced to accept charity, and all because we have not the facilities nor the machinery for properly distributing the things that we raise and make to feed and care for our population.

Present conditions emphasize in a very definite and positive way that our means of transportation must be improved. The United States has reached a point where it produces more than it consumes, and it has become essential to our prosperity that we seek foreign markets for our surpluses. Shipping facilities must be improved and freight rates reduced. President Hoover evidently had this in mind when he made his notable speech at Louisville a couple of years ago. You will recall that he included in his program the St. Lawrence shipway. On that occasion he said:

"One of the most vital improvements to transportation on the North American Continent is the removal of the obstacles in the St. Lawrence River to ocean-going vessels inbound to the Great Lakes. Our Nation should undertake to do its part whenever our Canadian friends have overcome those difficulties which lie in the path of our making similar undertakings."

NORTH DAKOTA

By Hon. George F. Shafer, Governor of North Dakota

The advent of the St. Lawrence seaway has been too long delayed. Ever since the completion of the Panama Canal, the interior economic development of America has been sadly out of balance. The Panama Canal made the Atlantic and Pacific coasts of this continent close neighbors in commerce, and, by the same token, it correspondingly lengthened the distance, in terms of relative transportation costs, from the interior of the country to its ocean ports. Thus, coast cities flourished, while inland cities struggled against discouraging handicaps. Thus, industries were obliged to remove from interior points to locations on or near the seacoast. Thus, there was placed upon agriculture in the great mid-continent section a disadvantage beyond its ability to carry and still compete profitably in the markets of the world. Thus, there was created a condition of economic dislocation, sometimes called "economic inequality," between great sections of our country, a condition which lies at the base of much of the economic discontent for something existing in the mid-western and northwestern regions of our country, a condition which cries out for correction in a voice that is heard throughout the land. Because ocean commerce has no competitor in economy of costs, it will, when brought to the interior of the continent by means of the St. Lawrence River and the Great Lakes, do much to equalize transportation costs between seashore and inland centers of trade and production. This will not only restore the economic balance in accordance with the laws of economic justice, but it will revive both industry and agriculture in that vast empire lying between the Alleghany and Rocky Mountain Ranges.

While we have been patiently waiting for our Governments to open negotiations for a treaty providing for the joint construction of the St. Lawrence seaway, much progress has in fact been made by the two countries, acting independently but with a common purpose, to bring this gigantic improvement into existence. Millions of dollars have been expended in deepening and widening the connecting waters between the Great Lakes, improvements made directly toward the fulfillment of the seaway project. Many more millions have been appropriated by the United States Government to carry on still further improvements of like nature in those waters.

The United States is anxious for the opportunity to assume its full share of the responsibility for completing this partnership enterprise. This opportunity is now at hand. By securing the prompt ratification of the forthcoming treaty, and by speedily enacting the necessary enabling legislation, we may yet see the beginning of construction on the final unit of the St. Lawrence seaway within the span of another year.

WYOMING

By Hon. Perry W. Jenkins, of Wyoming, personal representative of Gov. A. M. Clark

Through isolation half the resources of our Nation have been locked up for over a century. Half of the area of our Republic lies to the west of the Missouri. With a potential wealth scarcely touched, when the Mountain States come into their own, an awakening of the West will bring to the East the realization that a new era has dawned.

Wyoming is 1,000 miles from Chicago, embracing 100,000 square miles of land, rising 1,400 feet above the sea to gather moisture with which to water her fertile acres. The Geological Survey has estimated these resources at over one-half million for each member of her present political family. It has enough coal to meet the present market demands for 150,000 years. Coal is only a fraction of her stores; oil, shale, iron, copper, potash, aluminum are produced in the millions of tons.

Here is a State whose agriculture, supported by irrigation, is as rich as any of her sister States. Her cattle number over 1,000,000 head; her sheep are two and a half times that number. Agriculture is in its infancy and on the increase.

Would you have this wealth find its way to the Pacific coast and the Orient? Or would you prefer that it leave its trail of gold across your threshold? The growing tonnage already convinced our State that the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway from the Lakes to the ocean was the only solution of our transportation problem. Ten years ago we began a campaign of education; in 1923 we passed an act that committed our State to this project; this year a still stronger act of legislation shows that our interest is unabated.

Our congressional delegates, our State officials—in fact, all the people of the State—are a unit in advocating speedy consummation of your program.

As the years go by and the West awakens to her opportunity and her bounties are realized, there will pour down around her great railway centers a flood of commodities that will make the port of Chicago one of the largest markets of the world.

What I have said about my own State will be repeated by sons of sister States; a still greater boon to humanity will be accomplished by the drawing closer of the ties that have so long bound the United States and Canada together.

Not a fort, with its grim guns, guards the boundary; not a threatened war shall mar the security of the Great Lakes. Where on any other continent to-day do such conditions prevail? A common parentage and a common God unite us. Let us hope that a common waterway may yet strengthen the bonds that have existed over a century of peace. Let us work for the speedy completion of this new enterprise and add another tie that will bind us still closer, so that Canada and the United States may proceed hand in hand in development for mutual good.

CALIFORNIA

(A letter from Hon. James Rolph, jr., Governor of California)

I deeply regret that I will be unable to attend your highly important waterway meeting in Chicago. Pressure of State business, however, makes it impossible for me to leave California during that period.

I am heartily in accord, however, with any move that will complete a through seaway from the Great Lakes to the Atlantic Ocean, thus placing the interior of the continent on an ocean base for rate making.

Any movement that makes for quick and cheap transportation makes for progress and prosperity. And any such step that benefits a section of the Nation benefits the entire Nation. Therefore, California is deeply interested in the success of your endeavor.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. KING, from the Committee on Immigration, to which was referred the bill (S. 7) to provide for the deportation of certain alien seamen, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

Mr. HOWELL, from the Committee on Claims, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

ADDRESS BY HON. RAY LYMAN WILBUR, ENTITLED "SELF-MANAGEMENT, THE BASIS OF CITIZENSHIP"

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I present for publication in the RECORD an address by Dr. Ray Lyman Wilbur, Secretary of the Interior, before the regional conference of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, December 5, 1931, 3 p. m., at Foundry M. E. Church, entitled "Self-Management, the Basis of Citizenship."

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Late one evening I was sitting on a cliff looking down over a wild patch of woods and meadows in the California mountains. Suddenly a she bear and two cubs came out of the brush into an open space. The mother bear looked back at each cub and evidently gave instructions that they should follow close at her flanks until they were again under cover. One cub started to wander off and was called back two different times, but the third time the mother took a quick turn and slapped him until he rolled head over heels for 15 or 20 feet. He then scrambled to his feet and ran up close to his mother, staying there until they disappeared. I have often wondered why it was that bears manage to get along so well, in spite of guns and traps and scarcity of food and a world of difficulties that have been brought to them by man. Evidently they are brought up according to bear laws and learn how to be bears.

Each one of us has just the same kind of a problem to face as we go from youth to maturity. Each of us controls a body machine and has a brain for that purpose, as well as to connect us up with the world of reality. Each of us must learn to handle himself, to go on his own power, to be a self-starter, to do many automatic things. Each one must, through instruction or experience, develop his own rules for the care of himself and of his own conduct. The period when we go from youth to maturity is the most interesting and important of all. It is a great thing to grow up, get new knowledge and a new sense of power. After watching thousands of young men and young women I have learned to have confidence in those who have learned self-management and self-control. We are born with impulses and emotions that, uncontrolled, would carry us frequently to disgrace and disease. We are tempted many times. Based on a study of a lot of abnormal people, many normal persons seem to think that self-indulgence makes character, creates respect in others, and develops health. Nothing could be further from the truth. The wise young person is the one who can learn by the experiences of others. Those who have to try everything once are sure to be damaged in the process. It is not common sense to be foolish.

Just at present our youth are facing a period of transition and are breaking away from old standards and conceptions of life. They see about them freedom of conduct, to copy which is easy, but to follow which is full of peril. Youth faces danger willingly, but intelligence and observation should show us that a sane, wholesome, and useful life inside of a living body requires the same kind of protections for it that we place about our automobiles so that they will operate efficiently and properly.

In this somewhat troubled period, each young person must face one question that has been before most young people throughout human history. Human beings long ago discovered certain drugs and chemicals, among them a group that are known as narcotics and anæsthetics. These include alcohol, ether, gasoline, cocaine, opium, etc. One of the long, hard struggles of mankind has been to master these valuable agents. Each has its proper place. Administered and used by experts, they are great servants. Misused and self-administered, they often lead to bad habits and degradation. They have the unfortunate quality of clouding personality or uncovering human attributes that are normally held under control. The principal difficulty with the use of alcohol is that its effect upon a person involves others. When one person is no longer able to manage himself, others must manage him. When families are involved, others suffer from the effects of the drug. Society as a whole must pay the full price for any misuse of these chemical substances that materially affect the central nervous system, consciousness, and personal responsibility.

In the social struggle against alcohol, the commonest of these drugs, this country has passed certain laws and has placed a clause in the Constitution of the United States. This is a country which depends upon majority rule. Until a majority by proper course have determined that these constitutional provisions and these laws are not desired it is the proper function of a citizen to obey. Certainly, no young citizen beginning his life career can consider that he is managing himself well if he begins by violation of any law of his country. I realize that there is much publicity about alcohol and prohibition, but there is also a great deal of intellectual shallowness in meeting the social and legal questions involved. Sad as it may seem, in spite of great literature, fine plays, sports, and family life, we have a lot of people with empty minds that are never comfortable unless they are filled up with alcohol. There have always been such people, and no doubt there will continue to be, but youth in making its choice certainly ought to strive for the thing that is strong instead of that which is weak. One hates to be what is called a goody-goody, but one can obey the law and do the sensible thing without feeling that way about it.

I have often noticed that those who are the most careless in their habits have been the first to praise those who take good care of themselves, such as the members of the football squad who obey the training rules. I am convinced, too, that many of our boys and girls to-day boast of breaches of conduct and pose as rather devilish in order to show people that they have grown up and are quite worldly. In their hearts and in their real attitudes toward themselves and in most of their conduct they are decent, sane, and thinking of a future career full of interest and noble action.

My suggestion, then, to you is to look these questions right in the eye and not allow yourselves to be fooled by those about you and have the courage not to join in unless you wish to do so. No one can make you drink unless you want to. You must do your own swallowing. You must remember, too, that some of us must obey the Constitution so that when future tests of it come, as they surely will, we can fight with clean hands and not have our strength stolen away by the knowledge that we belong among those who make personal decisions as to what laws to obey. The sense of having violated laws seems to create a strong emotional reaction against them as a method of self-justification. Much of our present agitation comes from stinging consciences.

Manage yourself in that way which leaves no regrets and no scars, and life will give you self-satisfaction, comfort, and happiness.

INVESTIGATION OF RAILROAD PROBLEMS

Mr. TOWNSEND, from the same committee, reported back favorably, with an amendment, the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 3), submitted by Mr. COUZENS on the 9th instant, establishing a joint congressional committee to make a general investigation and study of railroad problems.

The amendment was, on page 4, line 3, to strike out "$10,000" and insert "$1,000," so as to make the concurrent resolution read:

Whereas many railroads are involved in grave financial difficulties, and all the railroads have sought a 15 per cent increase in freight rates; and

Whereas there is a movement now in progress to reduce the wages of all railway employees, although it appears that approximately 500,000 normally necessary railway employees are now unemployed, and many thousands of others have only part-time employment, and that the present earnings of a large percentage of the employed railway workers are less than the amount necessary for a decent livelihood; and

Whereas responsible representatives of the railroads have indicated that financial assistance of the Federal Government will be sought in order to maintain the operations of many railroads, and to avoid further impairment of transportation service and further deferment of necessary maintenance, with the resulting increase of unemployment; and

Whereas an emergency exists requiring that a coordinated program be developed immediately to preserve continuous and efficient railroad transportation and to avoid the imposition of intolerable burdens upon either the necessary investment or the necessary labor required to maintain this essential public service; and

Whereas there is no single agency of the Government authorized to develop such a program, or charged with full responsibility for determining the extent to which Government aid can and should be extended to meet all the needs of the present emergency: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there is hereby established a joint congressional committee to be composed of the chairman, the ranking majority member, the ranking minority member, and the next ranking minority member of the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the Senate, and the chairman, the ranking majority member, the ranking minority member, and the next ranking minority member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House of Representatives. The committee is authorized and directed to make a general investigation and study of all matters affecting the operations of common carriers by railroad subject to the interstate commerce act, with a particular view to determining to what extent the Federal Government can aid during the present emergency in preserving continuous and efficient transportation service by railroad, in alleviating the financial difficulties in which many such carriers are involved, in relieving the distress of the unemployed railroad workers, and in preventing further unemployment among such workers. The committee shall report to the Congress from time to time during the first session of the Seventy-second Congress the results of such investigation and study, together with its recommendations for necessary remedial legislation.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the first session of the Seventy-second Congress, to employ such experts, and clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, to require by subpœna or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, and to take such testimony and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $1,000, shall be paid one-half from the contingent fund of the Senate and one-half from the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the concurrent resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I am wondering what the committee can do with $1,000 to investigate the railroad problem; and, further, what more can be disclosed than has been brought out by the long hearings before the Interstate Commerce Commission. I should be glad to have the Senator state his views in that respect.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I do not know whether the Senator from New York has read the purposes of the concurrent resolution; but in the preamble I pointed out the observations that I have secured from railroad executives over the weeks and months since I have returned to Washington and been in contact with them as to their needs.

I point out here in the preamble:

Whereas responsible representatives of the railroads have indicated that financial assistance of the Federal Government will be sought in order to maintain the operations of many railroads, and to avoid further impairment of transportation service and further deferment of necessary maintenance, with the resulting increase of unemployment.

Then, further, I point out that—

There is no single agency of the Government authorized to develop such a program or charged with full responsibility for determining the extent to which Government aid can and should be extended to meet all the needs of the present emergency.

In other words, the committee, if formed, so far as I can speak for it, would not be required to go out and get any witnesses or to make a physical examination of the railroads. It would be a forum where the representatives of the railroads themselves could come and present their needs and suggest what might be done by Congress to assist them.

As the Senator knows, there are several ways of doing this. One way is to provide loans to the railroads through the President's proposal for a reconstruction loan agency. Another is to provide loans to the railroads in the same manner as was provided heretofore, when the railroads borrowed money from the Federal Treasury with adequate security and repaid it, so that in the final analysis there was a profit to the Government.

Those are two ways in which the railroads might be relieved financially. There is no other place to which they can go except Congress to deal with these subjects. In order to expedite matters and to prevent the necessity of the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the Senate and the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House having to duplicate the hearings and to prolong the discussion, it was my view that a concurrent resolution should be passed providing for the creation of a joint committee to deal with the subject.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I am much interested in what the Senator says. There can be no doubt that the railroads are in a desperate condition. When a great system like one going through my State—the New York Central Railroad—a system which has not failed to pay a dividend for 60 years—finds itself confronted by such distress that it passes its dividend, and its stock has so declined that it is no longer legal for certain institutions in my State to use it as security, it gives evidence that something is wrong.

I have no disposition to assent to a protracted hearing on the part of the committee—a hearing which undoubtedly would cover very much of the material which was gone over at great length through the summer. On that account I have serious question about the propriety of passing this concurrent resolution.

It would seem to me that the right way to do would be for the Senator from Michigan, who is informed on the subject and competent to do it, to prepare a bill which in his judgment would cover the needs of the railroads so far as the Congress can relieve the distress and present it to the Senate. Then it can be referred back to his committee with full authority to conduct such hearings as may be needed to develop whether or not his plan is a wise one.

To answer the question which undoubtedly will be asked by the Senator, "We have to have the material, do we not?" let me say that every detail of that material must be included in these extensive hearings.

Mr. COUZENS. Will the Senator yield at that point?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes.

Mr. COUZENS. There is no desire to repeat the collection of that information. The interstate commerce commissioners can come down and tell us all we desire to know; but as far as I know the railroads have made no application or request, except through me personally, for any aid. I am not in a position to speak for the railroads as to what they claim their needs to be, but certain representations have been made to me which justified this concurrent resolution.

There will be no repetition of testimony. The only objection I can see to the Senator's suggestion that I introduce a bill on the subject is that a bill of that kind would have to be introduced in both Houses, and we would have to go through the same process in each House. If a joint committee is created, the railroads can appear and tell us what they want; and the concurrent resolution provides, not for a final conclusion of the hearings, but that reports shall be made from time to time as to what might properly be done to aid the railroads.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, what the Senator has said strengthens my impression that this measure would lead to protracted discussions without having any objective in mind except a hazy one to give relief if relief is possible.

I am perfectly candid in my opinion that the right way to do is for the Senator to present a bill outlining what he thinks should be done. Then all of us will be prepared to give thought to the recommendations made by the Senator and to see whether or not we agree with him in his suggestions.

Mr. COUZENS. Will the Senator yield further?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York further yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. COPELAND. I do.

Mr. COUZENS. I have no idea what to present. The railroads have made no showing. I could not prepare a bill stating what ought to be done. I want the representatives of the railroads to come down here and tell us what they think ought to be done, how it ought to be done, and what position they think the Government is in to carry out their recommendations. I can not present a bill in advance. I do not know.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, without prejudice at all to the question—and I may say that I am impressed by what the Senator has said—I ask that the matter may go over. I will talk to the Senator about it, and perhaps we can take action later.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The concurrent resolution will be placed on the calendar.

EXTENSION OF LEGAL HOLIDAYS IN THE DISTRICT

Mr. CAPPER. From the Committee on the District of Columbia I report back favorably, with amendments, Senate bill 655, declaring December 26, 1931, to be a legal holiday in the District of Columbia, and I submit a report (No. 7) thereon. At the request of the committee I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill, because of the emergency character of the legislation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the title of the bill for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 655) declaring December 26, 1931, to be a legal holiday in the District of Columbia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, may I ask whether it is a general measure making December 26 a legal holiday hereafter?

Mr. CAPPER. No; it applies only to December 26, 1931, and there is ample precedent for the bill.

Mr. FESS. I have no objection if it is not a general law.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments, in line 3, after "1931," to insert "and January 2, 1932"; in the same line to strike out "a legal holiday" and insert "legal holidays"; and at the end of line 4 to insert "Provided, That all employees of the United States Government in the District of Columbia, and all employees of the District of Columbia, shall be entitled to pay for said holidays the same as on other days," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That December 26, 1931, and January 2, 1932, shall be legal holidays in the District of Columbia: Provided, That all employees of the United States Government in the District of Columbia, and all employees of the District of Columbia, shall be entitled to pay for said holidays the same as on other days.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, not having had the opportunity of being at the committee meeting this morning, as I had two other committee assignments, I understood that this bill was to deal only with the 26th of December. I see now that it has been elaborated.

Mr. CAPPER. It is amended to apply to New Year's Day as well as to Christmas, in view of the fact that the same situation exists as to New Year's Day as to Christmas—that is, Saturday of that week is also a legal half holiday—and the bill simply makes it a legal holiday for the entire day. We did the same thing in 1925 at Christmas time, and we enacted similar legislation in 1930 with regard to the Fourth of July.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, why should we discriminate in favor of Federal employees in the District of Columbia as against Federal employees throughout the United States?

Mr. CAPPER. The measure simply makes it possible for a few per diem employees to receive their pay the same as all other Government employees will receive theirs, the latter being on a monthly basis.

Mr. KING. It is discriminatory legislation; but I shall not object.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the amendment of the committee including January 2, 1932, was agreed to, be reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the vote is reconsidered.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, it seems to me that this matter of declaring holidays is becoming quite a fad, to say the least. I was in thorough accord with allowing the employees one holiday after Christmas, but it seems to me that the giving of two holidays is rather unusual, is it not? I have not known of it being done in the past.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. Inasmuch as I introduced the bill under consideration, I wish to make the following explanation: Saturday, as the Senator knows, is a half holiday in the District of Columbia. Unless we make Saturday, the 26th of December, 1931, and Saturday, January 2, 1932, holidays for the whole day it will mean that the employees of the District of Columbia and of the Federal Government in the District of Columbia will be required to come to their offices for half a day.

Mr. DILL. Why should they not?

Mr. ASHURST. And the banks will be required to open for half a day. Inasmuch as we clamored for nine months that Congress should be in session, then when we get in session deadlock over the office of President pro tempore, and then adjourn for about 12 days, I fail to perceive why Senators object to granting the faithful overworked and underpaid Government employees in the District of Columbia an additional half day. I hope the Senator will not object.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I do not want to be put in the position of objecting to people having a half holiday, but I think we are going too far when we start by giving them an extra day and then give them two extra days.

The Senator spoke about the banks and the bank people. It is proposed that all the banks be closed, practically, for three days during each of two weeks. It is being proposed that the Government departments shall answer no mail, shall give attention to no requests which come from the Members of the House or of the Senate, or from the country.

I do not think there is any terrible burden on the employees if they have to come down for half a day. I think that the second part of this bill should be stricken out.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator that if Christmas Day and New Year's Day fell on any other day except Friday, this bill would not be suggested; but inasmuch as the two holidays, Christmas and New Year's, come on Friday, Sunday being a holiday anyway, I can not see that any harm can come either to the Federal public service or to the District of Columbia by allowing these people to have Saturday morning off, in view of the fact that they have Saturday afternoon anyhow. There will be very little work done, I imagine, on Saturday morning, after Christmas on Friday, with another holiday coming on Sunday.

Mr. DILL. I am not objecting to the holiday the day after Christmas.

Mr. BARKLEY. The same situation applies to New Year's Day.

Mr. DILL. No; it does not apply at all. New Year's is not a day of festivity. It is not a day of celebration compared with Christmas time.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator is mistaken about that. It is quite a day of festivity, and a night of festivity also.

Mr. DILL. There is another phase of this situation to consider. Why should Government employees in the District be given two holidays here when such employees outside of the District are not given either of these days? Why not make this apply to Government employees all over the United States, if it is so desirable?

Mr. BARKLEY. There is no demand and no request for it, in the first place. I may say to the Senator that so far as the banks are concerned, it does not work any hardship on them. They are perfectly willing to have this done. If it is not done, they will be required to open.

Mr. SMITH. Why worry about the banks? Most of them are taking a holiday anyhow, closing up permanently.

Mr. DILL. I think we ought to have a vote on that part of the bill which provides a holiday after the 1st of January. In other words, I think the part making January 2 a holiday should be stricken out, and I move to strike it out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment offered by the Senator from Washington will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Washington proposes to strike out the words " and January 2, 1932."

The VICE PRESIDENT. What is desired by the Senator from Washington may be accomplished by voting down the committee amendment.

The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment. [Putting the question.]

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask for a division.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, let the question be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will again be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The original bill read as follows:

That December 26, 1931, shall be a legal holiday in the District of Columbia.

The committee proposes to strike out the article " a " and the word " holiday " and to insert " and January 2, 1932 " and the word " holidays."

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, there is some confusion about what we are trying to do. I wish some one who is familiar with the bill would explain it.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I proposed that inasmuch as Christmas Day would be a holiday and half of Saturday would be a legal holiday——

Mr. BARKLEY. And all of Sunday.

Mr. ASHURST. Yes; that we should make all of Saturday, December 26, a legal holiday. That was the bill in its original form. But the Committee on the District of Columbia added " Saturday, January 2, 1932."

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, let me interrupt right there. The amendment was made at the request of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator from Washington has moved to strike out the amendment which proposes to make Saturday forenoon a legal holiday in the District of Columbia. That is the way the question arises.

Mr. DILL. Only as to January 2, 1932.

Mr. ASHURST. Yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Did not the Chair state that the vote would come on the committee amendment and that the objective of the Senator from Washington could be obtained by the rejection of the committee amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That was the statement of the Chair, and that is the way the question will be put.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Arizona a question. Does this mean that all the Federal employees of the District of Columbia will have a holiday and that the same holiday will not be granted to Federal employees throughout the Nation?

Mr. ASHURST. It applies only to the District of Columbia, because in the District of Columbia Saturday afternoon is a legal holiday.

Mr. BLACK. May I ask the Senator whether he does not think it would be a fair proposition, if the employees of the Government here are given a certain holiday, that the same right should be extended to Government employees in other sections of the country?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the warm heart of the learned Senator prompts him to ask that question, and my own warm heart responds that if we had the power to do so, and if it were possible to do so, I would gladly have it done.

Mr. BLACK. Could it not be done for all if it is to be granted to the employees here?

Mr. ASHURST. No; it could not be.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, in this connection let me say there is no national holiday outside of the District of Columbia on any day by act of Congress. All the national holidays observed in the States are by acts of the legislatures of the respective States. We have no power to deal with that matter except in those places over which the Congress has jurisdiction.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I may say this to the Senator. I understand, of course, that what the Senator says is the case. I would not be in favor of an attempt to establish a national holiday, but this simply relieves the employees referred to of the necessity of working on the specified days indirectly. Certainly Congress would have the right, if it saw fit, to provide by amendment to this bill, or in some other way, that employees of the Government throughout the country should be relieved from labor on that day.

Mr. ASHURST. Congress would have that power, but the discussion as to the constitutional right of Congress to do so would so engage the abilities of constitutional lawyers, and to such a protracted degree, that the holiday would have gone by long before we got the bill through.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. DILL. I would like to have the Chair state what we are to vote upon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment making January 2, 1932, a legal holiday.

Mr. DILL. If we agree to the committee amendment, we make January 2 a holiday?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is correct.

Mr. DILL. If we vote down the committee amendment, we shall not make it a legal holiday?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct.

Mr. DILL. Then my amendment really was not in order at the time it was offered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment. Did the Senator from Wisconsin ask for the yeas and nays, or ask for a division?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I asked for a division when I assumed that the committee amendment had been defeated by a viva voce vote. But now that the matter has been explained to the Senate, I am willing that a viva voce vote be taken upon it.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, may I ask whether this applies merely to January 2, 1932?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the amendment which is before the Senate.

Mr. CAPPER. It applies only to the holiday season, which begins next week.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the passage of the bill as amended.

The bill was passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill declaring December 26, 1931, and January 2, 1932, to be legal holidays in the District of Columbia."

COMMERCE AND TRADE WITH CHINA—EXPENSES OF FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMITTEE

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I report back favorably, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, Senate Resolution 96, with an amendment, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

The amendment was, in line 9, after the word "purposes," to strike out "$10,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$5,000," so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations and the subcommittee thereof authorized and directed by Senate Resolution No. 256 on June 2, 1930, Seventy-first Congress, second session, to examine and study stipulations relating to commerce in existing treaties of the United States and other governments with the Republic of China, and conditions that may affect our commerce and trade with China, hereby is authorized to expend in furtherance of such purposes $5,000 in addition to the amounts heretofore authorized.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

INTERNATIONAL NEWS SERVICE POLL ON PROHIBITION

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a painstaking poll made by the International News Service on the attitude of Congress toward prohibition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WETS ABLE TO COUNT ON 155 IN HOUSE—LARGE NUMBER ON BOTH SIDES OF CAPITOL NONCOMMITTAL—TREND IS WET

By George R. Holmes

The new Seventy-second Congress, although wetter than its predecessors, will not vote to modify the Volstead Act to permit beer and light wines.

There is a chance, however, that the new Congress may see a majority vote rolled up for some sort of referendum on prohibition, although it is extremely doubtful if two-thirds could be mustered for resubmission of the eighteenth amendment itself.

These are the outstanding results of a poll of Congress by International News Service—the only complete poll that has ever been made in Congress on prohibition in 10 years. Four hundred and thirty-four Members of the House were canvassed and 95 Members of the Senate, there being one vacancy in each branch.

ASKED TWO QUESTIONS

The Members were asked two questions:

1. Do you favor a referendum on the eighteenth amendment as proposed by the American Legion?

2. Do you favor legalizing beer?

The results were:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

For referendum, 155.
Against referendum, 96.
Undecided or noncommittal, 183.
A majority of the House is 218.

SENATE

For referendum, 32.
Against referendum, 29.
Undecided or noncommittal, 34.
A majority of the Senate is 49.

On the beer question, only 125 Members of the House and 21 Senators said they would vote in favor of it, the rest being frankly hostile to the suggestion or noncommital. Many of those willing to vote for a referendum on the whole prohibition issue were unwilling to vote for beer because they do not believe such action consistent with the amendment itself.

DEPENDS ON "UNDECIDED"

From these figures it is at once apparent the ultimate fate of the referendum hinges upon those large blocs in both Houses which are unwilling or unable to state now how they intend to vote upon it.

In the House this noncommittal bloc numbers 183. It would require 63 votes from this bloc to give the 155 a majority. In the Senate the undecided bloc numbers 34, and 15 of them would have to join the wet side to make a majority.

Many of those who preferred to be listed as noncommittal are really undecided until they see what form the proposed referendum takes. Many others declined to take a position on either side of the question for publication for fear of causing political repercussions in their home districts.

MANY TO DODGE VOTE

Prohibition is the bogey man in every Congressman's life—unless he happens to represent a district that is safely wet or safely dry. Some of those questioned in the International News Service poll even objected to being listed as "noncommittal." They just don't want their names associated with prohibition in any form—in print.

It probably is a safe prediction that when prohibition is voted upon this session—as it will be, since the new rule that 145 Members can cause the discharge of a committee considering legislation—some Members are going to find pressing business that will take them away from the Capitol that day.

THE PARTY LINE-UP

Analysis of the poll disclosed that prohibition has cut both parties almost in twain. The party division is interesting. It follows:

House vote on referendum

	Yes	No	Noncommittal
Republicans	81	36	97
Democrats	73	60	86
Farmer-Labor	1

Senate vote on referendum

	Yes	No	Noncommittal
Republicans	16	16	16
Democrats	15	13	18
Farmer-Labor	1

A number of Democrats stated frankly they would be noncommittal until "the party acts," presumably on candidate and platform at the convention next June. Southern Democrats particularly adopted this attitude in many instances.

DRIFT TOWARD WETS

That there has been a marked drift toward the wet side of the question, particularly in the past year, is very apparent. Many Members who have consistently voted dry for years on every question affecting prohibition now prefer to be listed as "noncommittal."

Many of them are really undecided; many others are politically fearful of making any commitment, especially since the allied dry organizations served notice recently that they would regard a vote for referendum as "a wet vote."

Some hitherto known drys stated they were inclined to vote for a referendum when the time comes, but insisted upon being put down as noncommittal. Still others declared they would be guided by the sentiment of their districts or States.

CONGRESS FAVORS POLL

Typical of this group who will be guided by home sentiment is Senator COUZENS (R.), of Michigan. He said he was willing to vote for a referendum, but that he would vote against beer. He said:

"Politically, I am a dry. As long as the constitution of Michigan prohibits all alcoholic beverages I shall vote as my constituents desire. If they express a desire for a change, I shall vote to carry out that expression."

Many others said the same thing in varying language.

POLL OF CONGRESS ON LIQUOR REFERENDUM FINDS SENTIMENT DIVIDED

Many and varied were the replies received from Senators and Congressmen in a poll on prohibition taken by International News Service.

Some of the replies follow:

Senator LEWIS (D.), of Illinois: "I think Congress should resubmit the eighteenth amendment. It was put over while we were at war, and see now how it has affected people."

Senator JONES (R.), of Washington, author of the "five and ten" law: "I will meet the situation when it comes up for official action."

Senator NORRIS (R.), of Nebraska: "I don't believe prohibition has had a fair trial. Its enforcement has been in the hands of its enemies. Until it has been given a fair test I am not in favor of a change. If, after a fair trial, there is evidence that it can not be enforced, then I will favor a change."

Senator LOGAN (D.), of Kentucky: "I see no valid objection to a referendum. I do not favor beer, for the Constitution forbids it."

Senator BAILEY (D.), of North Carolina: "A poll of the Members of Congress is contrary to sound public policy and ought not to be encouraged. For this reason I will not respond."

Senator ODDIE (R.), of Nevada: "I favor a referendum, but I prefer not to discuss beer, as that is a collateral issue and controversial as to percentages."

Senator DILL (D.), of Washington: "I can't answer your questions at this time."

Senator JOE ROBINSON (D.), of Arkansas: "I prefer not to make any statement concerning prohibition at this time."

Senator BYRNES (D.), of South Carolina: "My people are more interested in the return of prosperity than the return of liquor."

Senator GLENN (R.), of Illinois: "I favor anything not intoxicating in fact, but I wouldn't vote for an illegal beverage. I believe the people have a right to vote directly on prohibition, so I should favor a referendum."

Senator COOLIDGE (D.), of Massachusetts: "I favor a referendum on the eighteenth amendment, and I favor Government control of the manufacture and sale of beer through agencies properly guarded and restricted."

Representative BOLAND (D.), of Pennsylvania: "I am heartily in favor of the referendum, or any other bill that will eventually give the American people freedom from this hypocritical law."

Representative MCGUGIN (R.), of Kansas: "I am opposed to either a referendum or legalizing beer. I don't wish to see prohibition made an issue in the next election. It would only becloud vital economic and social issues which should be before the people."

Representative KVALE (F.-L.), of Minnesota: "I have never opposed and never will oppose a referendum for which there is a clear popular demand. No on beer."

Representative WHITLEY (R.), of New York: "I'm in favor of amending the eighteenth amendment to give each State so desiring control of liquor within its borders."

Representative FINLEY (R.), of Kentucky: "Why not a referendum on the Mann white slave law and the Harrison antinarcotic law? What's the matter with the beer we now have?"

Representative CLARKE (R.) of New York: "I have no program except to loyally follow our President. You can put me down as extremely noncommittal on everything but the President's program."

Representative MILLARD (R.), New York: "Yes to both questions. I think prohibition is wicked."

Representative FULMER (D.), of South Carolina: "I'll listen to the arguments and then vote the way I think best."

Representative DOUGHTON (D.), of North Carolina: "I'm dry but I'm open-minded on some method to improve conditions in the interest of real temperance."

Representative DAVIS (D.), of Tennessee: "I'm opposed to bringing up prohibition in any form."

Representative RAGON (D.), of Arkansas: "I'm opposed to either the referendum or beer at this time. But I don't know what the future will bring."

Representative FERNANDEZ (D.), of Louisiana: "I'm wringing wet."

Representative MILLIGAN (D.), of Missouri: "I'm noncommital until my party has spoken."

Representative BANKHEAD (D.), of Alabama: "I wait on my party."

Representative DICKINSON (D.), of Missouri: "I'm noncommital, but tolerant."

Representative RAMSPECK (D.), of Georgia: "Georgia has a State law more drastic than the Volstead Act. Until some action is taken in Georgia indicating a change in sentiment, I deem it my duty to reflect the sentiment expressed by the enactment of the Georgia statute."

Representative LUCE (R.), of Massachusetts: "My answer is, 'That depends.'"

Representative JONES (D.), of Texas: "The meat and bread problem is far more important at this time than the drink issue."

Representative COOKE (R.), of New York: "I favor a referendum, although I have little faith in its efficacy as a relief measure."

Representative WOODRUFF (R.), of Michigan: "I favor a referendum. But I do not believe beer with an alcoholic content that will satisfy those asking for it can be provided by law under the Constitution."

POLL SHOWS BIG GAINS BY WETS—MANY NEW MEMBERS OF CONGRESS AMONG THOSE WHO WANT REFERENDUM

(Following is the second of a series of three articles based upon a prohibition poll of Congress made for the Washington Times by International News Service, the only complete poll ever made:)

By George R. Holmes

The new Seventy-second Congress, which probably will witness a real test vote on prohibition for the first time in years, reflects enormous gains for the opponent of the eighteenth amendment.

This was clearly shown in the complete poll of the membership by International News Service on two questions:

1. Whether the Members favored a referendum on the amendment.
2. Whether they favored legalizing beer.

HOW THEY STAND

The poll disclosed that 32 Senators and 155 Representatives favored the referendum, 29 Senators and 96 Representatives opposed it, while 34 Senators and 183 Representatives have not made up their minds or were unwilling publicly to state their position.

On the beer question 21 Senators and 125 Representatives said they would vote for modification of the Volstead Act. The others were either opposed to it or noncommittal.

Upon this great bloc of noncommittal or undecided Members in both Senate and House depends what the Seventy-second Congress will do, if anything, concerning the issue at this session.

The gains the opponents of prohibition have made in the new Congress were most strikingly manifested in analyzing the poll of the new Members taking their seats for the first time.

MANY NEW MEMBERS WET

Of the present House membership of 434 there are 87 new or "baby Members." The poll disclosed that of this new membership 45 are frankly opposed to prohibition, 29 prefer to be listed as noncommittal, and 13 are dry. Incidentally, the new drys come from sparsely populated districts.

Another striking feature of the poll was the revelation that many Southern Democrats, hitherto dry almost to a man, are becoming more and more noncommittal on the question, possibly in anticipation of a party stand on the issue in the platform and candidate next year.

In 10 States of the old South, having a combined membership of 97 in the House, there were 53 Members who listed their attitude as noncommittal, or who professed unwillingness to state their views on the specific questions asked.

Virginia offered one example of this increasingly cautious attitude on the part of the southern Democrats, the nine Democratic Members from Virginia all stated their position as noncommittal. The one Republican Member said he would oppose both a referendum and modification. Virginia is one of the pioneer prohibition States and the home of Bishop James Cannon, jr.

INDIANA AND IOWA

Indiana and Iowa, usually regarded as dry States, furnished only one negative vote each. Four of the Hoosier Members said they would vote for a referendum, while the others preferred to be noncommittal.

MORE SENATORS AIR VIEWS OF DRY LAW—SOME INDORSE REFERENDUM, BUT FEW O. K. LEGALIZING OF INTOXICATING BEER

Herewith are presented more of the replies received by International News Service in its poll of the Members of the Seventy-second Congress on the possibility of a referendum on prohibition and the question of legalizing beer:

Senator GEORGE (D.), of Georgia: "I do not favor repeal of the eighteenth amendment. Beer, if intoxicating, can not be legalized under the Constitution."

Senator BROUSSARD (D.), of Louisiana: "I favor a referendum on the eighteenth amendment and I favor legalizing beer."

Senator VANDENBERG (R.), of Michigan: "No question regarding a referendum can be intelligently answered unless the specific text is available. A referendum on repeal with concurrent submission of the proposed alternative would be ridiculous."

Senator HEBERT (R.), of Rhode Island: "I favor a constitutional convention because the people ought to be permitted to express their convictions."

Senator KING (D.), of Utah: "If we do anything at all with prohibition, we should submit the question of repeal. I favor no palliative."

Senator CAREY (R.), of Wyoming: "Beer would merely complicate the enforcement of prohibition. I favor a referendum on the eighteenth amendment, but there must be a new plan of control proposed before we can repeal the existing law."

Senator REED (R.), of Pennsylvania: "If there is to be a referendum, Congress should submit the question of repeal or modification to the people."

Senator BARKLEY (D.), of Kentucky: "I won't vote for any beer bill that I believe violates the Constitution."

Senator HATFIELD (R.), of West Virginia: "West Virginia is dry."

Senator SHORTRIDGE (R.), of California: "My section of the country is more interested in oil and other economic questions."

Senator BANKHEAD (D.), of Alabama: "Alabama has always been dry. I do not know about a referendum. I have not thought about it."

Senator HAYDEN (D.), of Arizona: "I voted for the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead Act, and I will vote to support them with any amount of money."

Representative DIETERICH (D.), of Illinois: "I favor repeal of the amendment in the manner provided by the Constitution; also legalizing beer in the quantities necessary to supply the wants of the citizenship."

CAPITOL POLL SHOWS G. O. P. WETTER PARTY—ISSUE LOOMS BIG IN NEXT CAMPAIGN—REPUBLICANS MUST FOLLOW DRY WHILE DEMOCRATS TRAIL ALONG WITH WET

(This is the concluding article of a series based upon International News Service's poll of Congress on two prohibition questions: (1) Whether the membership favored a referendum on the eighteenth amendment as proposed by the American Legion, and (2) whether it favored modification of the Volstead Act to legalize beer. Previous articles have disclosed that there is scant chance for modification at this session, but perhaps a chance of Congress voting in favor of some sort of a referendum.)

By George R. Holmes

The issue of prohibition bestrides the necks of both political parties—to the confusion and dismay of the leaders, who look with anxious eyes at the coming presidential election.

In the new Seventy-second Congress, whose Members have hardly taken their seats before they have to figure on reelection next year, the situation is unique and somewhat chaotic.

REPUBLICANS DIVIDED

The Republicans are preparing to follow the dry leadership of President Hoover—yet 81 Republicans in the House have publicly committed themselves in favor of a referendum on the eighteenth amendment and most of this number also favor modification of the Volstead Act.

The Democrats are resigned to going into the election next year behind a wet presidential candidate, perhaps even on a wet platform as well—yet 60 Democrats in the House are absolutely opposed to either a referendum or to modification of the Volstead Act.

In the Senate the figures are proportionately the same.

The Democratic drys from the South and West are fearful and uneasy.

ALL FEARFUL AND UNEASY

But the Republican wets are just as fearful and just as uneasy—perhaps more so, in view of the action taken yesterday by a group of wet Republicans.

These Republicans met and organized a militantly wet bloc under the chairmanship of Representative James M. Beck, of Pennsylvania, former Solicitor General of the United States, and their purpose, as publicly stated, is to "dispel the illusion that the Republican Party is a dry party."

In the complete poll of the membership of the Seventy-second Congress on prohibition, just concluded by International News Service, it was disclosed that approximately 40 per cent of the Republicans in the House were publicly in favor of a referendum on the eighteenth amendment, and a somewhat lesser percentage in favor of voting for beer. Approximately 43 per cent were undecided or noncommittal, and only 17 per cent were absolutely opposed to any action looking to a change.

HOW DEMOCRATS STAND

Among the Democrats of the House, approximately one-third or 33 per cent, declared themselves in favor of a referendum, while 37 per cent were on the fence, and 30 per cent were opposed.

Thus, paradoxically enough, the poll disclosed that despite the dry Republican national leadership, and the wet Democratic national leadership, the Republicans of the House are really wetter than the Democrats, at least so far as a referendum on prohibition is concerned.

The Senate is drier than the House, being a continuing body where the Members are elected for 6-year terms instead of two.

The 48 Republicans in the Senate split three ways on the question of a referendum. Sixteen favored a national referendum, 16 opposed, and 16 were noncommittal.

The 46 Democrats polled split 15 for a referendum, 13 against, with 18 noncommittal.

The recapitulation of both Senate and House on a prohibition referendum showed:

House

	For	Against	Noncommittal
Republicans	81	36	97
Democrats	73	60	86
Total	155	96	183

Senate

	For	Against	Noncommittal
Republicans	16	16	16
Democrats	15	13	18
Farmer-Labor	1
Total	32	29	34

MANY BILLS TO ACT UPON

It is the huge "noncommittal" blocs in both parties and in both Houses that will determine what, if anything, the present Congress does about prohibition.

There are bills enough galore to act upon. In the House alone, in the first few days of the session, more than 50 bills and resolutions were introduced for repeal of the eighteenth amendment, proposing new amendments to devitalize the eighteenth and to modify the Volstead Act. The sponsors of these measures were about evenly divided as between Republicans and Democrats.

That there will be a test wet-and-dry vote this session seems assured under the new rules adopted by the House. Heretofore all prohibition modification bills have been kept locked up in committees under the old rules, which gave autocratic powers to the House leadership. Under the new rules, when 145 Members sign a petition to get a bill out of committee and on the floor, the committee can be discharged from further retention of the measure.

HAVE SUFFICIENT VOTES

The International News Service poll revealed that 155 Members of the House are publicly committed to a referendum, or 10 more than the number required to force a vote under the new rules.

The show-down or test of strength is viewed with apprehension by the great "noncommittal bloc," which in the House numbers 183. They will be compelled to stand up and be counted, and they don't relish it with party platforms still to be adopted and an election only 11 months away.

In the course of taking the poll, many of the noncommittal bloc privately told the canvassers that they intended to vote for a referendum if the test came on that issue, although they insisted upon being publicly catalogued as noncommital. They didn't want to state in advance for fear of inciting attacks by the drys.

Similarly, many others privately declared their intention of voting against any chance, but likewise insisted upon being listed as noncommittal for fear of attracting wet opposition in their districts.

NONCOMMITTALS BALANCED

Probably the noncommittal wets about balanced the noncommittal drys on the question of a referendum, with probably a remaining third of the noncommittal bloc being really undecided, perplexed, and very much disturbed about what they are going to do.

Between the organized drys, who have served notice that a vote for a referendum will be considered by them as a wet vote, and the growing strength of the organized wets, the life of an on-the-fence Congressman from a debatable district is no bed of roses.

SMOOT FORESEES PROHIBITION VICTORY; OTHERS DIVIDED ON REFERENDUM

Herewith the third and concluding installment of varying congressional comment gathered by International News Service in its poll of Congress on prohibition referendum and the legalization of beer:

Senator SMOOT (R.), of Utah: "I want to know more about the exact form of a referendum before committing myself. If a referendum were taken, I think the prohibitionists would win."

Senator PITTMAN (D.), of Nevada: "I don't see what Congress can do. It's really up to the States. If they elect a wet Congress, the prohibition law will be repealed; if they don't, the law will remain as it is."

Senator NORBECK (R.), of South Dakota: "My State is more interested in farm relief than in referenda on beer."

Senator STEIWER (R.), of Oregon: "I am making no public statement on the question at this time."

Senator CONNALLY (D.), of Texas: "I do not favor a referendum nor legalizing beer."

Senator FLETCHER (D.), of Florida: "I'm inclined to favor a referendum, but I don't favor beer."

Senator NEELY (D.), of West Virginia: "I'm noncommittal."

Senator THOMAS (D.), of Oklahoma: "I favor neither beer nor a referendum."

Representative CHRISTOPHERSON (R.), of South Dakota: "I favor prohibition, but am willing to seriously consider any propositions submitted."

Representative COOPER (R.), of Ohio: "If those opposed to prohibition bring forth some plan of control in the case the eighteenth amendment were repealed, there is no question that many who believe in prohibition would go with them on a referendum.

Representative WILLIAMS (D.), of Missouri: "I think it should be referred to a constitutional convention. It is useless to amend the Volstead Act."

Representative LOVETT (D.), of Tennessee: "I am opposed to resubmission at this time. We should try greater enforcement."

Representative WOLFENDEN (R.), of Pennsylvania: "I'm for relief from prohibition in any form the question takes."

Representative LEA (D.), of California: "I favor a referendum, but I don't know about beer; I'd rather go to fundamentals."

Representative GREGORY (D.), of Kentucky: "I am opposed to either a referendum or beer, but I think there should be a change in the legal machinery. Penalties are too heavy and abuses too great."

Representative WHITTINGTON (D.), of Mississippi: "Generally, I favor national prohibition until something better comes along."

REPAYMENT OF DROUGHT LOANS

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I desire to introduce a bill and to make a brief statement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the Senator making a statement regarding the bill he desires to introduce? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Kentucky will proceed.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, at the last session of Congress, as we all recall, an appropriation was made authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to make loans to farmers in the drought areas for the purchase of seed, feed, and other things necessary to enable them to produce crops. Those obligations have been falling due, and are now falling due. In my State, the main money crop being tobacco, markets have opened within the last week or two, but the prices offered the farmers have been so low that most of them have been induced to return their crops to their farms, because the price offered was less than it cost them to produce the crop. Many of them are unable, therefore, to repay the Government their obligations or to pay their taxes or to make any payments on other obligations.

In view of that circumstance, it seems to me that the wise and just thing would be for Congress to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to extend these loans one year more, and I am introducing a bill, which I desire may be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to do that thing.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, may I ask the able Senator from Kentucky if his bill refers to the $65,000,000 appropriated last year?

Mr. BARKLEY. It refers to the amount of money appropriated in the last Congress to make loans to farmers in the drought areas. I suppose it would include the entire $65,000,000, the $45,000,000 appropriated, and the subsequent appropriation which was for rehabilitation.

Mr. McNARY. It covers both items?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes. It proposes to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to extend for one year these loans out of both funds.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 2265) to extend the time for repayment of certain loans to farmers for the crop of 1931 was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

PROPOSED INCLUSION OF TRAINED RESERVES IN DEFINITION OF ARMED FORCES

Mr. SHEPPARD submitted a resolution (S. Res. 111), which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate of the United States that trained reserves be included in estimating and limiting the military strength of nations participating in the forthcoming conference for reduction and limitation of armaments, and that the delegation representing the United States at such conference be so advised.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, in connection with the resolution, I submit an excerpt from the Journal of the Texas House of Representatives giving its proceedings in regard to the matter covered by the resolution, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

There being no objection, the matter was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution of Texas House of Representatives favoring inclusion of trained reserves in the definition of armed forces in connection with world disarmament (by Mr. Hatchitt)

Whereas the highest purpose of America in participating in the World War was the establishment of permanent peaceful international relations by steps toward a better observance of international law, in part through reductions in the armaments in the various nations; and

Whereas in compliance with said purpose the Washington Conference was held in 1921, and the London Naval Conference was held in 1930, both of which said conferences labored for mutual limitations on naval forces, and in compliance therewith in 1932 the first opportunity since 1914 for limitation on both military and naval forces will present itself at the first general conference for the reduction and limitation of armaments, in which said last-mentioned conference the United States will participate; and

Whereas responsible statesmen agree that civilization can not now survive another general war, that the poverty-stricken and tax-ridden peoples require an abandonment of competition in armaments and limitation on armed forces, and that without such limitation another general war will be inevitable within a few years; and

Whereas there is danger that trained reserves will be omitted in whatever treaty may be submitted by said last-mentioned conference in limiting the armed forces of the various nations that will participate in said last-mentioned conference, although the major military strength of every modern nation is made up of its trained reserves; and

Whereas it would be impossible for the contemplated treaty to weaken the present military strength of the United States; and

Whereas the people of Texas and the people everywhere are vitally concerned in the success of said conference: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the earnest desire of the House of Representatives of the State of Texas as the representatives of the people of this State that the Senate of the United States do everything in its power to contribute to the success of said last-mentioned conference, and that if possible the Senate of the United States require that trained reserves be included in the armed forces of the nations participating in said last-mentioned conference as said armed forces may be limited under the contemplated treaty; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD, senior United States Senator from Texas for his presentation to the Senate of the United States.

BRADLEY.
HUBBARD.
HATCHITT.

The resolution was read the second time.

Mr. Burns, of Walker, moved that the resolution be referred to the committee on military affairs.

Mr. Gilbert moved to table the motion, and the motion to table was lost.

Question recurring on the motion to refer the resolution, it prevailed.

PROPOSED SECOND MORNING HOUR FOR CALENDAR CONSIDERATION

Mr. SHEPPARD submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 113), which was referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That paragraph 3, Rule VII of the Standing Rules of the Senate be, and the same hereby is, amended by adding between the word "Mondays" and the word "the" in said paragraph the words "and Thursdays."

INVESTIGATION OF SHORT SELLING

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I desire to introduce two Senate resolutions. I shall not ask for immediate consideration, but will ask for a few moments to explain the resolutions.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the Senator explaining the resolutions? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Oklahoma is recognized for that purpose.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, we have just passed a bill providing a holiday in the District of Columbia. In some sections of the country every day is a holiday for the condemnation of Congress. Last winter we were told that if Congress would adjourn and go home the big interests and big business would work out a salvation for the United States and the world.

On the day that we adjourned, on the 4th of last March, the stock of the Illinois Central Railway was selling at 78. On the 28th day of November, just a few days ago, the stock of this concern had fallen 65 points, or 83 per cent.

On the 4th day of last March New York Central Railway stock was selling at 116¼. On November 28 it was selling for 28⅛, a loss of 88⅛, or 75 per cent of the stock value of the corporation.

On the 4th of March Baltimore & Ohio Railroad stock was selling at 76⅛. On November 28 that same stock was selling for 23⅛, a loss of 53 points, or 68 per cent.

United States Steel on March 4 was selling at 143½. On November 28 that stock was selling for 53⅛, a loss of 79⅞ points, or 63 per cent. On yesterday, I am advised, the stock of the Steel Corporation reached a low of 36, a loss of 107 points since March 4. Such loss was sustained during the time when these interests said that if Congress would adjourn and go home they would be able to work out a return to prosperity.

I shall not take the time to read the entire list to which I have been referring, but I ask unanimous consent that it may be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The list is as follows:

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. I should like to ask the Senator if he has ascertained whether the earnings of the corporations, whose stocks he is quoting and as to which he has noted the falling off in the market price, have fallen off a like percentage? In other words, do the earnings of these corporations justify this decline in the prices of their stocks?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. My information is that the decline has no relation to the real value of the stock or the actual earnings of the company. There is little relation, if any, between the two.

Mr. SMITH. The point I wanted to bring out is that perhaps we have developed a system in the country by which the stocks and debentures which are issued by our corporations are a matter of speculation rather than a reflection of what they are contributing in the way of production and dividends.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, the subject of my remarks is the identical matter suggested by the Senator from South Carolina. A short time after we adjourned on March 4 wheat on one single day declined in value on the exchanges something like 10 cents per bushel. The people generally believe that the cause of these declines is what is known as short selling. The farmers believe that the low prices of their commodities—corn and cotton and wheat—are caused by the bear raids upon the commodity exchanges. The people of the country who own much of the stocks of these companies believe that the reason why the stocks are selling so low to-day is because of the combinations or pools in New York and elsewhere raiding the exchange markets and bearing these stocks down.

A few days ago the head of the New York Stock Exchange, Mr. Richard Whitney, delivered an address in Syracuse, defending the policy of short selling. In the last paragraph of his address he laid down the "defi" of the exchanges, those in New York and the commodity exchanges in Chicago, New Orleans, and other places; and here is the last sentence of his address:

In so far as the exchange is concerned, the defense of short selling is not a matter of opinion. It is a matter of principle.

The newspapers of the country gave much attention to this address made by Mr. Whitney. It was only preliminary to the releasing of quite a volume by the Stock Exchange of New York. On December 15, 1931, the New York Stock Exchange sent to a number of the Members of this body quite a volume explaining and trying to justify the practice of short selling. I exhibit to the Senate a copy of that volume. The newspapers of the country gave elaborate reviews to this release. The New York Times, on December 17, printed more than a full page in analysis of the release of the New York Stock Exchange.

Mr. President, the issue is joined. The country believes, whether rightfully or wrongfully, that this practice now in vogue on the commodity exchanges and on the other exchanges—the practice of short selling—is the cause of the low prices of the stocks and commodities of the country. The senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] has introduced a resolution asking for an investigation. The senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], the majority leader, is on record, if the public press may be believed, in favor of such an investigation. Perhaps other such resolutions have been introduced. In order that the committees may have the benefit of such suggestions as the Members can make, I desire to offer two resolutions. I send those two resolutions to the desk and ask that they be read for the information of the Senate.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before that is done, may I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. KING. Without desiring to dissociate myself from the position taken by the Senator I would like to ask if there has not been a deflation in labor? Labor has suffered a decline in wages. Is it not a fact that most of the stocks, or at least many of the stocks, that were sold upon the stock exchange and forced upon the people by the high-powered salesmanship of some of the banks and brokers of New York and elsewhere, were entirely too high? Is it not true that they are not as low now as they were in 1920 and 1921; that some of the stocks are even now too high and that they have not been shaken down to the proper level yet.

My own opinion is, if the Senator will pardon me, that many of these stocks reached altitudinous heights without merit and as a result of predetermined efforts upon the part of those who submitted them to the public to force them upon the public. They did everything they could to augment their values notwithstanding that the stocks were worth perhaps not more than 10 or 15 per cent intrinsically of the values for which they were being sold on the market.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Answering the question submitted by the distinguished Senator from Utah, I exhibit a special correspondent's article dated New York, May 21. This news item is headed "Utilities Earned Largest Profit in the Worst Year. Net Income Last Year Was 2 Per Cent Greater than All-Time Record of 1929." I ask that the text of the article may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

UTILITIES EARNED LARGEST PROFIT IN THE WORST YEAR—NET INCOME LAST YEAR WAS 2 PER CENT GREATER THAN ALL-TIME RECORD OF 1929

NEW YORK, May 21.—Gross revenues of 21 of the leading 23 utility systems of this country were nearly $44,000,000 higher in 1930 than in 1929.

The gross revenues of the 21 companies were $2,101,336,523 in 1929. This was an all-time record, made in a year which was marked by feverish, if uncertain, prosperity. But in 1930 the same companies had gross revenues of $2,145,065,916, a gain of $43,729,393, or something over 2 per cent, made in the worst business year of the last half century.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. As a further answer to the inquiry just submitted, I have another news story under the headline "American Telephone and Telegraph Resources over $5,000,000,000. Company's financial operation are second only to those of United States." I ask that it likewise be incorporated in the RECORD in my remarks at this point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

AMERICAN TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH RESOURCES OVER $5,000,000,000—COMPANY'S FINANCIAL OPERATIONS ARE SECOND ONLY TO THOSE OF UNITED STATES

By Charles F. Speare

NEW YORK, March 7.—Next in size to those of the United States Government are the financial operations of the American Telephone & Telegraph Co. as described in the report for 1930. The figures reflecting the different phases of activity by this premier American public utility are bewildering to the layman in their scope, running up frequently into billions of dollars.

The total assets of the Bell system at the end of 1930 were over $5,000,000,000. The amount of its capital obligations in the hands of the public was $3,271,619,000. During 1930 the company spent for development and research and for additions, betterments, and replacements the sum of $585,000,000, or about 70 per cent as much as was spent for capital improvements in that period by all of the American railroads. It took in earnings from dividends, interest, and from telephone operations of over $292,000,000, and paid out in dividends more than $139,000,000. And during 1930 the company added to its list of stockholders nearly 98,000 names, the largest increase for any one year in its history.

To-day there are nearly 575,000 shareholders in the company. At the end of December it registered 567,694. The report states that there are holders of American Telephone & Telegraph stock in every State of the Union, as well as in 70 foreign countries and United States possessions. Consequently it is the most widely known issue in the world and the daily fluctuations in its price affect the mood of investors in every part of the globe. Since 1921 the holders of Telephone stock have increased from about 190,000 to the present figure of approximately 575,000. Included in this total are over 100,000 employees of the Bell system, whose average holdings are 10 shares, compared with the average for the entire body of stockholders of 32 shares.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I have another rather interesting news item under the heading "Billion Dollar Firms Now Number 24 in the United States." Not desiring to take up the time of the Senate to read it, I ask that this be inserted likewise at this point in my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

BILLION-DOLLAR FIRMS NOW NUMBER 24 IN UNITED STATES

The list of billion-dollar corporations in America, selected on basis of total assets, now numbers 24 and includes 7 railroads, 5 public utilities, 5 banks, 4 insurance companies, and 3 industrials, according to a compilation made by American Trustee Share Corporation. They are:

American Telephone & Telegraph; United States Steel; Southern Pacific; Pennsylvania Railroad; Standard Oil of New Jersey; New York Central; Canadian Pacific; Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe; Union Pacific; Consolidated Gas of New York; Baltimore & Ohio; Cities Service; Commonwealth & Southern; United States Electric Power Corporation; General Motors; Chase National Bank; National City Bank; Guaranty Trust of New York; Continental Illinois Bank & Trust; Transamerican Corporation; Metropolitan Life Insurance Co.; New York Life; Equitable Life; and Prudential Insurance Co. of America.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I now ask that the resolutions just introduced by me may be read for the information of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read the first resolution (S. Res. 114), as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency be, and is hereby, authorized and requested to investigate for the purpose of ascertaining to what extent, if at all, there has been during the four years last passed so-called short selling of stocks, bonds, and securities and of commodities as the result of combinations so to do among and between individuals, copartnerships, associations, corporations, or any or all of them in combination and to what extent, if any or all of the various stock exchanges have facilitated any such sales or selling, to the end that the Senate may be informed as to what legislation, if any, may be necessary or advisable in the premises.

And also to ascertain to what extent, if any, as the result of any combinations of individuals, copartnerships, associations, corporations, or all of them in combination, known false and untrue statements or inventions have at any time or times during the four years last passed been put abroad, circulated, and published concerning any stocks, bonds, securities, or in any manner or degree related to them or any of them for the purpose of affecting them marketwise, either to depress them or to inflate them, and also to what extent, if at all, any agencies or instrumentalities have knowingly loaned themselves to or assisted in the circulation and publication of any such false statements or inventions knowing or having reason to believe the same to have been false, to the end that the Senate may be informed as to what legislation, if any, may be necessary or advisable in the premises.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I ask that the resolution just read be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so referred.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I ask that the second resolution be read for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 115), as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate request the President to direct the Attorney General of the United States to immediately summon or convene an extraordinary Federal grand jury to conduct an inquiry as to what extent, if at all, any individuals, copartnerships, associations, or corporations have, during the four years last passed, engaged in short selling (so called) of stock, bonds, and securities as the result or by reason of any combination or agreement so to do for the purpose of depressing the prices of stocks, bonds, and securities and to what extent, if at all, any stock exchange has facilitated the same, to the end that it may be determined if any Federal law or laws has or have been violated.

And also to ascertain to what extent, if any, as the result of any combinations of individuals, copartnerships, associations, corporations, or all of them in combination, known false and untrue statements or inventions have at any time or times during the four years last passed been put abroad, circulated, and published concerning any stocks, bonds, securities, or in any manner or degree related to them or any of them for the purpose of affecting them marketwise, either to depress them or to inflate them, and also to what extent, if at all, any agencies or instrumentalities have knowingly loaned themselves to or assisted in the circulation and publication of any such false statements or inventions knowing or having reason to believe the same to have been false, to the end that it may be determined if any Federal law or laws has or have been violated.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. As a further explanation and justification of the two resolutions I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement, as I do not care to take the time to read it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The statement is as follows:

All constructive forces are working to bring about a resumption of normal business conditions. This is the solution of unemployment. The most potent factor now in business depression is the almost absolute lack of confidence, and in its stead the presence of fear. He who can restore confidence will have furnished the necessary impetus to business return. Psychology is a most important factor. Investment in stocks and securities is so closely related to business and business conditions that the two can not be considered separately. Prior to the late war very few of our people knew anything about securities and stock markets. The masses knew nothing about them. The Government, through its war-bond sales, first undertook their education, which resulted in the people, as a whole, becoming stock minded. Following the war, the great industrial organizations of the country were quick to recognize this condition and to avail themselves of it, as presenting an opportunity to them to do their financing by the sale of their securities to the earners and savers. The work of these organizations completed the education of the people. Large undertakings of public improvements are not financed by few individuals of great wealth. Such financing can only be accomplished by the use of the savings of the wage earners.

It is said that 20,000,000 of our people were interested in stocks and the stock market when the debacle of the fall of 1929 occurred. Loss and distress were widespread. Immediately following the debacle, efforts to overcome the shock, to stabilize, to be constructive, were made by all but a few, and compared to these few, Captain Kidd was a man of high ideals. The stock market, and all that it means, have become so much a part of the lives of our people that no effort of reconstruction can be successfully undertaken that does not regard it as an important factor. For more than a year stock prices and stock values have little or no relation. Commercializing the timidity of the people, powerful groups of "bears" have spread rumors and "gone short" in stocks and in commodities creating further loss and distress among the people. To destroy courage, instill fear and panic is the "stock in trade" of these people. The circulation of false rumors and statements were made only for the purpose of frightening the holders of securities and commodities and causing them to sell at losses, at which time the bears cover their short sales, and their gain is the sum of the loss of those who have been frightened.

It will be recalled that in 1929 or 1930, when it was apparent that the market was being daily raided and vicious, false rumors systematically circulated, the president of the New York Stock Exchange voluntarily sent out a notice requiring all of its members to report at the close of business each day the names of all individuals for whom they that day had made short sales, the names of the stocks, and the number of shares. Short selling instantly ceased and the market advanced and continued to advance, and there was a much better feeling, until this order was rescinded, whereupon, and almost immediately following, the old distress returned. The financial reporters of the great daily papers are an intelligent lot of men. On the reports of these men their papers almost daily tell openly of "bear raids" and of unfounded rumors depressing prices. It is significant that a few weeks ago when England abandoned the gold standard that the New York stock exchanges immediately forbade short selling for a limited time. Why?

I recall a report that was circulated that the Wickersham committee would report in favor of beer and light wines. This was immediately followed by what appeared to be a raid on Coca Cola and Canada Dry Ginger Ale. The raid and the rumor brought about a large volume of sales in these two stocks, and no doubt those who sponsored it cleaned up again.

This is only one instance of hundreds of other wholly unfounded stories that have been put afloat for the purpose of terrorizing and the sum of the loss of the victims was the gain of those who were guilty. From the stories that have been circulated hardly any financial institution has escaped attack. The farmers, our largest and most important group, have been damaged by billions, while other groups have lost by millions.

Millions of people have been "wiped out," while perhaps many still own their securities. Their incomes may not have been decreased, but they are worth, in security prices, only a fraction of what they were formerly; also their credit is decreased to this extent. These people feel that rigid economy is necessary, and it is useless, in my opinion, to urge them to spend or employ.

It seems to me that an open and obvious condition exists which is in violation of our laws against "combinations in restraint of trade." As I see it, there are two methods of procedure which conditions demand to solve the difficulty. One is a resolution by the Senate requesting the presidents of the New York stock exchanges to require their members to report at the close of business each day the names of all individuals for whom they have made short sales, the names of the stocks, and the number of shares, and that the exchange each day report these to the Department of Justice. This request would, undoubtedly, be immediately complied with. The other is a resolution requesting the President to direct the Department of Justice to immediately convene an extraordinary grand jury for the purpose of ascertaining whether in this respect our antitrust laws have been violated. If these two steps are taken, the American colony in Paris would probably be materially augmented.

Many of our States have established divisions in their legal departments devoted entirely to investigation and the prosecution of individuals and corporations who seek to sell fraudulent and worthless stocks and securities to the gullible public. Our courts grant injunctions restraining these individuals and corporations from continuing such activities. It is possible that the Department of Justice has undertaken some of these crusades. At any rate, the Post Office Department has repeatedly denied the mails to these concerns. These people are engaged in taking the wealth of the people through fraudulent means, and giving them nothing in return but a worthless printed certificate, regret, and distress. The combination short selling, instead of inspiring confidence, as a means to an end, as the others do, instills fear, but the result is the same to the people. Why should we pursue in one case and lift no hand in the other?

It was disclosed in an investigation a few years ago that the people of this country had invested something over $135,000,000,000 in American securities. These securities did not represent stock-market commitments. They represented outright investment. This sum represented a tremendous credit in the hands of the people. Every time the market is raided the value for credit purposes of these securities is lessened, because bankers accept securities as collateral at the market price regardless of what their ideas of actual value may be. What a different state of mind would exist if the credit and worth of the people is even partially restored and confidence is allowed to take the place of fear. What I suggest I do not consider as in any degree artificial. It is simply removing a deadly menace from the path we must travel.

I am not concerned in this matter with the welfare of those people who are in the stock market, but am considering them and the stock market simply as a means to an end.

I recently read in a metropolitan newspaper the financial article that accompanies the daily report of the market, and find that it aptly describes what I have in mind. It speaks of the efforts of "operators for the decline." I think two forces are at work. One led by the President and Congress and made up of those who are constructively inclined, striving to accomplish the most desirable result, and an opposing force, "operating for the decline."

I know of one undertaking for construction, involving the expenditure of $150,000,000, 40 per cent of which represents labor. The material to be used must be specially constructed, which would represent another 40 per cent to be expended for labor. Obviously, undertakings of this magnitude have to be financed. The usual procedure is for a group of bankers to enter into contract to purchase the securities. They in turn distribute them to the public. The public to-day has no confidence, largely for the reasons that I have set forth. Here is a project, with well over a hundred million dollars to be expended for labor, perfected and ready to go ahead, but which can not be attempted under present conditions, and yet what the people desire and need is work, and not charity, and the suggested project is only one of many "frozen enterprises."

I do not contend that the action suggested will be a panacea for all the ills which confront the country, but I do assert that such policy has major possibilities.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I ask that the last resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be so referred.

A FIREARMS CONTROL ACT FOR THE NATION'S CAPITAL

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I present for publication in the RECORD a radio address delivered by the senior Senator from Kansas, Mr. CAPPER, a member of the advisory council of the National Antiweapon Association, which was broadcast on the 16th instant.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It is always a pleasure to talk to the people of the District of Columbia about the problems confronting them. I have always found that the citizens of Washington are intelligent, fair-minded, and progressive. The fact that they have no vote does not incline them to any apathy in public affairs. When any important civic question arises, they rise to meet it. They think about it and present their opinions to the commissioners or to Congress. That is why I like to go to the people of this city for suggestions or criticism of proposed laws that affect them.

I am going to ask you to think to-night of a really critical condition present in Washington which affects every one of you, young and old. I want to ask you if you can reconcile in your minds a system of laws that does everything possible to regulate carefully the sale of deadly poisons, while on the other hand it all but encourages an unrestricted traffic in deadly weapons.

You probably know that anyone with the price can walk into a store where guns are displayed for sale, select a weapon, buy cartridges, sign a fictitious name and address in the seller's record book, and leave the store without any question. The purchaser may be buying that gun to protect his home or for target practice or for hunting. Again, he may be buying it for some less innocent pursuit.

Now, a great many people do not regard a revolver primarily as a deadly weapon. They think of it in connection with its proper and legitimate uses. They would keep it in a safe place and take care of it.

But it would be foolish to deny that a great many other people, who have no respect for law, think of a revolver as a tool to help them in their illegal and immoral method of living. The hold-up man, the burglar, and the hired killer of the underworld depend on firearms for their livelihood. The revolver is the gunman's business equipment. It is a most deplorable fact that the laws of the District offer no more obstacles to the gunman in getting his business equipment than they do to the law-abiding citizen.

It seems to me that this is a situation we can not conscientiously ignore. It is true that Washington is less afflicted with gangsters and racketeering than other American cities. But even if we had no criminals here, the promiscuous sale of firearms would offer another very grave question. I mean the use of firearms by children and irresponsible persons.

I am sure that the parents who are listening to me would no more let their children play with a gun than with a rattlesnake. Some of you may be surprised to hear me say that the use of firearms by children is growing and is taking a dreadful toll in young lives throughout the country. But the facts can not be denied. You can hardly pick up a newspaper in these days without finding that some child has shot a playmate or himself.

Do you know that in the State of Washington a 12-year-old child recently was sentenced to life imprisonment for murder? That sad case has a parallel in California, where a boy of 15 was given a similar sentence for a like crime. On December 2, the local newspapers carried stories from Chicago stating that four children had been killed and two badly wounded in gun battles in and near that city. A few days later a 14-year-old gang leader in Detroit shot to death a boy of 15. Within the past few days a 16-year-old boy committed suicide in Nantucket, Mass., by shooting himself.

What do these revolting tragedies of American childhood mean to us? Are we, as responsible elders, to stand idly by and witness this useless, preventable sacrifice of the youth of America? These children, of whom I have told you, were not hardened criminals. They were not in the ghastly business of killing for gain. Was it their fault that they found deadly weapons ready to their hand? Of course not. The answer is this: It was too easy for them to get a gun. To-day, in the District of Columbia, it is too easy for children to get guns.

I am sure you do not want such news stories as I mentioned here to go out to the country from the Nation's Capital. I know you do not want your fine city shamed and degraded by a modern slaughter of the innocents. But our lack of law on this important point is bringing us closer every day to similar outrageous tragedies.

It is my job, as chairman of the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia, to assist in the enactment of laws for the District. I think I should be grossly derelict in my duty to Congress and to the people of Washington if I did not try, to the best of my abilities, to prohibit by law the untrammeled trafficking in firearms in this city.

I want to say here and now that I do not believe laws will cure all of man's troubles. I believe also that a law is only as efficient as its enforcement. But this particular evil can be curbed by law. We have adequate machinery for its enforcement in the District. More important than all, I know that the good people of Washington will be found wholeheartedly in support of this movement to banish the gunman from your city, and to keep guns out of the hands of your children.

I hope to introduce very soon in the Senate a bill that will accomplish the purposes I have outlined. I am convinced that the bill will not prescribe any harsh or unreasonable restrictions on any law-abiding, responsible persons. Some folks who have heard about the bill think I want to confiscate all kinds of firearms and dump them into the Potomac, and make it impossible for anyone to buy a gun for any reason whatever. This is not so. Let me tell you briefly some of the things proposed in the firearms bill.

The sale of revolvers is forbidden to convicts, drug addicts, habitual drunkards, incompetent persons, and persons under the age of 18. Convicts are forbidden to possess revolvers.

Sales may be made only after 48 hours after application to the seller. In applying to purchase a gun the buyer must make out a blank to contain information that can be easily verified by investigation. The laws against carrying concealed weapons are made more rigorous. A crime of violence committed by a person armed with a revolver carries an additional penalty. The licensing of persons to carry guns is also treated in the bill.

Those are the high points of the bill. I do not think that any provision of the bill will cause any serious inconvenience to the honest firearms dealer and the honest purchaser of firearms. In fact, this bill has been criticized by some folks as dealing too leniently with the matter of selling firearms. Personally I think it is fair to everybody concerned in its provisions.

At any rate, whether the bill is too mild or too strict will be fully and freely discussed before the District Committee. It is our policy to give the public the fullest possible opportunity to be heard on legislative matters concerning the District. This bill is not going to be rushed through Congress if it does not meet with the approval of representative opinion of the District's people.

From my experience on the District Committee I know that Washingtonians are quite able to express themselves clearly in opposition to unpopular legislation. I have known a real furore of public opposition to manifest itself against bills that would operate against the people's interest.

And now, in concluding, I want to assure you all that I am doing my very best to protect and maintain your interests in the District Committee, and I want you to feel free to let me know your ideas on any bills concerning the District.

And as it may happen that I may not meet all of you within the next week, let me wish you a very merry Christmas and a happy and prosperous new year.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the order is agreed to.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 53) requesting certain information regarding air mail contracts, as follows:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, requested and directed to furnish to the Senate at the earliest practicable moment the following information:

1. A list of the various air mail contracts made for carrying air mail in the United States proper, such list to show the date of the contract, the name of the contractee, the mileage of the contract, the amount of compensation, the route of the contract, and the amounts of mail in pounds of each class carried under each contract. If a space contract has been entered into, give reasons for entering into such space contracts.

2. The same information in reference to all contracts handled by the department for the carriage of mails to foreign countries by air mail.

3. State whether the domestic contracts are uniform and, if so, furnish a copy of the contract entered into. If they differ, point out the differences in such contracts, or furnish copies of same.

4. If the contracts for foreign air mail are uniform, furnish a copy of the uniform contracts, and if they differ, point out the differences in such contracts.

5. The number and names of the corporations carrying air mail for the Government, the number and names of corporations bidding on contracts and whose bids were rejected, and give copies of all rejected bids.

6. The number of routes and the mileage of each which has been extended since the passage of the Watres Act, and the additional schedules.

7. A map of the United States showing the location and mileage of all routes now being used and showing the main routes and extensions, differentiating the same by markings showing the main routes and extensions on said map separately.

8. Give the names of the officers and the attorneys of each aircraft company carrying mails, together with the names of the board of directors of each company. If any contract is controlled by a holding company or companies, furnish the same information as to holding companies.

9. Finally, a tabulated statement concerning all these contracts, showing, among other things, the number of bids received, and the amount of each bid and the reasons for rejecting same, if such bids were rejected, the bid accepted, the changes made in the contract by extension or otherwise, the amounts paid per mile, the amount of space, the number of pounds for the transportation of mail under original contracts, and the changes or extensions, the payments made to the various aircraft carriers and including the method of payment, and the amounts of appropriation and the amount expended out of said appropriation, and, finally, any other information pertinent to these contracts available in your office.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution. Is there objection?

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 18, 1931

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Infinite and eternal God, in whose might rests the destiny of nations and men, we pray that we may live up to the full measure of our Christian manhood. Teach us, our Father, how to estimate wisely the great debt and obligation which we owe our country, which so thoroughly appreciates men and their values. A mite of malice is too much, while a big measure of charity is not enough; an ounce of selfishness is too much, while a pound of generosity is not enough. A bit of war is too much, while a whole lot of peace is not enough. Increase the power of these values that make for goodness, fraternity, and cooperation, and diminish the things that are evil and that separate men. O let Thy purpose and Thy will be done in the very heart and mind of this Congress. Through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills and a concurrent resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 263. An act to promote the conservation of wild life, fish, and game, and for other purposes;

S. 655. An act declaring December 26, 1931, and January 2, 1932, to be legal holidays in the District of Columbia; and

S. Con. Res. 2. Concurrent resolution to pay Anna Jarvis a sum equal to six months' compensation of the late Grant Jarvis.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I submit a bill and privileged report from the Select Committee on the Fiscal Relations Between the United States and the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill relating to the contribution of the United States toward defraying the expenses of the District of Columbia.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak for two minutes to make a correction.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday I made a statement in regard to the taxpayers in the District of Columbia. I do not care for myself, but I do for the committee, to correct a misquotation in this morning's press. I do not want the committee placed in a false position, because the reverse of the misquotation is true. The press this morning quoted me as saying the taxpayers might move outside of the District if they chose to do so because of objection to the committee proposals in regard to matters of taxation in the District. That was not it at all. Just the reverse. A suggestion was made that if residents moved outside, it would enable them to have a voice in public affairs, for matters of the District are under the control of Congress under the Constitution and could only be changed by amendment. I also said they would be "relieved" from taxation as long as they remained within the confines of the District. Taxes are higher in all surrounding States and that has been a repeated statement, for no one would find lower taxes elsewhere.

CHARLES C. KEARNS

Mr. POLK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. POLK. Mr. Speaker, ladies, and gentlemen, since adjournment yesterday, I have learned of the death of Hon. Charles C. Kearns, a distinguished citizen of Ohio. For 16 years Mr. Kearns was a Member of this House, as Representative from the sixth Ohio district. While Mr. Kearns was my immediate predecessor and political opponent, and while we differed in our opinions on many public questions, I wish to state to the House that our personal relationships were always most cordial. I always found Mr. Kearns to be a most kindly and affable gentleman. During his long service in the House he was honored by his party by being placed on the Ways and Means Committee, and I am sure I express the sentiment of all my colleagues from Ohio, from both parties, when I state that we all have a feeling of personal sorrow in the passing of Mr. Kearns.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. SNELL. May I have the attention of the gentleman from Illinois for a moment in regard to the program. As I understand, the moratorium bill is up to-day, and probably the land bank bill will follow. What has the gentleman in mind following that?

Mr. RAINEY. We expect to go forward with the foreign debt postponement bill to-day and conclude it, even if a night session is necessary.

Mr. SNELL. I hope that we will pass it to-day.

Mr. RAINEY. I hope that Members will limit their remarks as much as possible and remain on the floor, because the demand for time has been very large.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman from Illinois will ask unanimous consent that Members may extend their remarks in the RECORD on the moratorium bill, it might save us much time.

Mr. RAINEY. I will make the request after the bill comes back to the House that all gentlemen who have spoken on the bill may extend their remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. BLANTON. But how about those who do not speak to-day? Will not the gentleman make the request now and include them?

Mr. RAINEY. Very well; Mr. Speaker, I will include those. I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have five legislative days to extend their remarks in the RECORD on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that all Members of the House may have five legislative days in which to extend their own remarks on the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAINEY. In further explanation, we want to pass this bill to-day and remain in session until 12 o'clock or longer if necessary. We want everybody to remain on the floor. To-morrow we expect to take up the bill for the relief of the Federal land banks, and we hope to pass that tomorrow. After the holidays the first major piece of legislation we expect to consider is the Strong bill, providing emergency financing facilities for banks and other financial institutions. Hearings on that bill commenced to-day, and as soon as we can get the hearings completed and get it on the floor, after the holidays, we shall take that up.

Mr. SNELL. I am very glad to have the gentleman make that announcement, because we are all very much interested in that piece of legislation.

Mr. RAINEY. And a few moments ago the President sent instructions to me to say that while the bill we take up to-morrow provides relief for the Federal land banks, he will undertake to take care of the needs of the joint-stock land banks, the intermediate credit institutions, and other banking institutions out of the emergency financing bill, although they are not expressly named in that bill. The President will take care of all of them out of this bill as soon as we pass it.

Mr. SNELL. I think that is entirely satisfactory and very pleasing to this side.

Mr. RAINEY. We shall try to do the best we can to carry out that program on this side, if gentlemen on the other side of the House cooperate with us. [Applause.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. STEAGALL. May we not have an understanding that the bill for the relief of the Federal land banks will be finished to-morrow? There will not arise any occasion for extended debate upon that bill, except on one particular feature of it, which ought not to take very long. As I view the matter, I can not think there will be any difficulty in finishing the bill to-morrow. I am sure every member of the House will be glad to know that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. In order to ask the gentleman from Alabama a question. When will copies of that bill be available?

Mr. STEAGALL. Sometime to-day.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. The hearings on the debt funding bill closed yesterday. They have not been published. It is utterly impossible for Members of the House to get those hearings and inform themselves as to what took place before the Committee on Ways and Means by to-night. There is no need for any hurry about this. The bill can not possibly be passed in the Senate before the holidays. Why should we be forced to stay here and pass on this measure before the Members of the House have had ample opportunity to investigate the hearings and see what they are voting upon?

Mr. RAINEY. Oh, the gentleman was present yesterday during the entire hearings, and the valuable feature of the hearings was the gentleman's own speech. He remembers what that was.

Mr. RANKIN. I thank the gentleman from Illinois and will say that I was one witness who said what he thought, to say the least. The trouble is that I inserted in those hearings some telegrams, one from the President to myself, and my reply, and some other documents that are now at the Government Printing Office, and we can not get them even to refer to. I submit we ought to be permitted to have those hearings and read them and have an opportunity to inform ourselves on this vital question before we are forced to vote upon it.

Mr. RAINEY. We hope the hearings will be here before we get through. The gentleman can tell the House what those telegrams are.

Mr. RANKIN. I shall do my best.

Mr. RAINEY. The House has the utmost confidence in the gentleman and any statement the gentleman makes.

TAXATION IN THE DISTRICT

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute, and in that time to have the Clerk read a letter which I have.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to speak for one minute and during that time to have the Clerk read a letter. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. I shall not object in this case, but I think we should get on with the business before us. I shall object to any further requests of that nature.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

DECEMBER 17, 1931.

Representative JOHN J. BOYLAN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: May I thank you for your courage and fairness in raising your voice against the storm of hatred and prejudice that raged against the residents of the District of Columbia yesterday? I am an old lady, all of whose property is in Washington, so that I can not "move out," as so kindly suggested by one of our noble protectors. The proposed new taxes do not affect me, since I own no motor car, and the new income tax about balances the intangible tax (which I do not evade). But what troubles me is the feeling that I am governed by a body of alien enemies. I appreciate the few who stand out against the others.

Very truly yours,

HELEN LOUISE SARGENT.

TWO HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF BIRTH OF GEORGE WASHINGTON

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a concurrent resolution, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Concurrent Resolution 4

To provide for the appointment of a joint committee for the celebration of the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That a joint committee consisting of three Members of the House of Representatives and three Senators to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the Vice President of the Senate, respectively, is authorized to make suitable arrangements for a fitting and proper celebration in the House of Representatives on February 22, 1932, of the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. I ask the gentleman from Virginia to withhold that for a day at least. I know that some of the Members of the House, including myself, are rather disturbed at the amount of money which is being asked for and has been expended in the preliminary advertising of this celebration.

I do not believe we had better go any further until we have a definite understanding as to how much we are going to spend and how far we are going.

Mr. WOODRUM. This does not call for the expenditure of any money. The gentleman knows we always observe Washington's Birthday, and this being the two hundredth anniversary, it was thought proper to have this celebration.

Mr. UNDERHILL. The gentleman means it is for the House itself?

Mr. WOODRUM. This is for the House.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. May the Chair have the attention of the gentleman from Virginia for just a moment? I am informed by William Tyler Page, former Clerk of the House, who has been connected with the George Washington Bicentennial as its secretary, that this matter was discussed in a joint conference of the two committees, and that arrangements were made at that time for this celebration.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, this resolution is being introduced at the request of Mr. BLOOM, director of the bicentennial, and will in no way interfere with anything that they may want to do. In fact, it is contemplated that this committee will collaborate with the Bicentennial Committee.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. As I understand, this pertains to the exercises in the House on that day.

Mr. WOODRUM. That is all.

Mr. SNELL. So that there is no expense whatever connected with it?

Mr. WOODRUM. No expense, unless there is a special program printed, or something like that, but this resolution does not ask for the appropriation of any money.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It will be under the supervision and guidance of the Bloom committee?

Mr. WOODRUM. Oh, no; it will be under the supervision of the House committee, and, I take it, the committee will confer with the Bloom committee.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Then I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM]?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

FOREIGN-DEBT MORATORIUM

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it may be in order for me to move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the resolution (H. J. Res. 147) to authorize postponement of amounts payable to the United States from foreign governments during the fiscal year 1932, and their repayment over a 10-year period beginning July 1, 1933.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER] asks unanimous consent that it may be in order for him to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the resolution (H. J. Res. 147). Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLLIER. Now I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 147; and pending that motion, I would like to have an understanding, or some agreement, as to general debate on this matter.

As I understand, the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY], and I happen to occupy the same position in regard to this resolution, so I presume that under the custom any member of the Committee on Ways and Means opposed to the resolution will be permitted to control the time of those who are opposed to the resolution. It has been suggested that the general debate be concluded in five hours, two and one-half hours to be controlled by myself and two and one-half hours to be controlled by some member of the committee opposed to the resolution. Of the two and one-half hours controlled by me, I will, of course, grant a division of time to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY].

Mr. HAWLEY. Does the gentleman think five hours general debate is necessary?

Mr. COLLIER. Well, so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I represent those who are opposed to the bill, together with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY]. I am a member of the Committee on Ways and Means and filed a minority report. I have requests for five hours' time.

Mr. COLLIER. There is no intention on our part to hastily rush this matter through, yet I believe that five hours' debate on the part of those represented by the gentleman from Texas is a little unreasonable. I am willing to extend the time to accommodate them, however. I believe that five hours on each side is a little unreasonable, but I want to accommodate the gentlemen who oppose this resolution in order that every Member of this House may be heard. This is not only a national but an international matter, and I do not want it said that we hastily and hurriedly rushed the resolution through the House. How much time does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SANDERS] think he can get along with?

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. As a matter of compromise, we may get along with four hours, although I have requests for much more time.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, then I ask unanimous consent that the general debate be confined to eight hours, four hours to be controlled by myself, out of which I will yield an equitable division of time to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY], and four hours to be controlled by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SANDERS].

The SPEAKER. Is it the intention of the gentleman from Mississippi that general debate shall be confined to the resolution?

Mr. COLLIER. I shall certainly insist that the debate be confined to the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER] asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to eight hours, and be confined to the discussion of the resolution, one-half the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER] and one-half by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SANDERS].

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, may I state the request of the gentleman again? It is that there be eight hours general debate, four hours to be controlled by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER], chairman of the committee, four hours to be controlled by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SANDERS], who filed a minority report, and that the debate be confined to the subject matter of the resolution; and that out of Mr. COLLIER's time he will make an equitable distribution of it to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HAWLEY. Reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER] how much time he proposes to yield to me out of the four hours?

Mr. COLLIER. May I ask the gentleman how much time he will need?

Mr. HAWLEY. I think about half of that time, but I will yield back any that is remaining if the gentleman from Mississippi so desires.

Mr. MICHENER. Reserving the right to object, did I understand from the leader, Mr. RAINEY, that this matter would come to a vote before we adjourned to-day?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes. If we sit here all night, we are going to vote on this bill to-night.

Mr. CRISP. The membership will understand that after the general debate the resolution comes up under the 5-minute rule and there will still be further debate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 147, to authorize the postponement of amounts payable to the United States from foreign governments during the fiscal year 1932, and their repayment over a 10-year period beginning July 1, 1933.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 147, with Mr. BANKHEAD in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the resolution.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the resolution be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the resolution be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, if the resolution is read, it is printed in the RECORD automatically, but if it is not read, it is not printed. With the understanding that the resolution shall be printed in the RECORD I will not object, and I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be printed without reading.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman from Texas reserves the right to object, but says he will not object if it is understood that the full text of the resolution be incorporated in the RECORD. With that understanding the gentleman from Texas does not object.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I understand there is no objection to that being done.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to that modification of the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia to dispense with the first reading of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution follows:

Resolved, etc., That in the case of each of the following countries: Austria, Belgium, Czechoslovakia, Estonia, Finland, France, Germany, Great Britain, Greece, Hungary, Italy, Latvia, Lithuania, Poland, Rumania, and Yugoslavia, the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is authorized to make, on behalf of the United States, an agreement with the government of such country to postpone the payment of any amount payable during the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1931, by such country to the United States in respect of its bonded indebtedness to the United States, except that in the case of Germany the agreement shall relate only to amounts payable by Germany to the United States during such fiscal year in respect of the costs of the army of occupation.

SEC. 2. Each such agreement on behalf of the United States shall provide for the payment of the postponed amounts, with interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum beginning July 1, 1933, in 10 equal annuities, the first to be paid during the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1933, and one during each of the nine fiscal years following, each annuity to be payable in one or more installments.

SEC. 3. No such agreement shall be made with the government of any country unless it appears to the satisfaction of the President that such government has made, or has given satisfactory assurances of willingness and readiness to make, with the government of each of the other countries indebted to such country in respect of war, relief, or reparation debts, an agreement in respect of such debt substantially similar to the agreement authorized by this joint resolution to be made with the government of such creditor country on behalf of the United States.

SEC. 4. Each agreement authorized by this joint resolution shall be made so that payments of annuities under such agreement shall, unless otherwise provided in the agreement (1) be in accordance with the provisions contained in the agreement made with the government of such country under which the payment to be postponed is payable, and (2) be subject to the same terms and conditions as payments under such original agreement.

SEC. 5. It is hereby expressly declared to be against the policy of Congress that any of the indebtedness of foreign countries to the United States should be in any manner canceled or reduced; and nothing in this joint resolution shall be construed as indicating a contrary policy or as implying that favorable consideration will be given at any time to a change in the policy hereby declared.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the unanimous-consent arrangement entered into in the House before the House went into Committee of the Whole there are to be eight hours of general debate on the resolution and confined to the subject matter of the resolution. Under that agreement the gentlemen from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER], the chairman of the committee, is entitled to the control of four hours and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SANDERS] is entitled to four hours. The Chair now recognizes the gentleman from Mississippi, the chairman of the committee. [Applause.]

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the gentleman now state how much time he will yield to me?

Mr. COLLIER. Will half the time be satisfactory?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I yield two hours to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, the resolution before us to-day is no partisan measure. It is a measure which was primarily designed to relieve a depression which exists in this country and which exists to a much greater degree in other countries, a depression which was primarily the outcome of the greatest war in the history of all the ages, a war which in its intensity set in motion forces which shook civilization to its foundations and almost rocked the universe itself, a war in which 10,000,000 of the young manhood of the world were slain upon the battlefields and over twice as many more were maimed, crippled, or otherwise removed from the fields of life's productiveness, a war in which it is conservatively estimated that over two-thirds of the world's wealth, its treasure, and its developed resources were wasted, utilized, or destroyed.

Following that war came the inevitable reaction. Serious depression arose over here, and it was much worse across the water. In the latter part of May or the first part of June, 1931, the National Bank of Austria got into serious financial difficulty. It was in dire circumstances. This bank was, perhaps, the greatest financial institution in that section of Europe. It had exhausted its resources, and while friends and other countries came to its aid and put up, I believe, $14,000,000, yet that amount of money did not place that great banking institution upon a stable foundation. The lack of confidence in Austria by reason of the difficulties of the Austrian bank soon spread into Germany. It grew worse and worse. It was at once followed by large withdrawals of gold from the Reichsbank. Now, my friends, let us understand what the Reichsbank is in Germany. It is not a local bank like so many we have in America, but it is to Germany what our great Federal reserve system is to America. In two weeks, early in June, there was $107,000,000 in gold withdrawn from the Reichsbank; in another week the sum amounted to $130,000,000, and there was at the same time $100,000,000 in gold in exchange drawn from that bank. Soon the reserve was almost depleted. This situation became so acute in Germany that it was apprehended that unless immediate steps were taken there would be a general moratorium. By a general moratorium I mean the cessation of payments, both public and private, in that country.

The situation was so acute that we had the unusual spectacle of the President of a great Republic—a Republic with which not many years before we had been engaged in war—writing to the President of the United States for aid. President Hindenburg appealed to President Hoover for aid and intimated that unless aid were given that there might be a collapse of the financial structure of that great country.

Now, gentlemen, what would a financial collapse in Germany have meant? Germany is a country of between 60,000,000 and 65,000,000 people. To allow the financial structure of Germany to crumble and fall would have meant that all the adjoining smaller countries around Germany would have been dragged down in its fall. All trade would have been stopped; business stagnation generally would have followed; and all loans in Germany, private and public, would have been endangered.

Mr. HARE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLIER. I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me until I complete my statement.

Mr. HARE. I just want to ask one question.

Mr. COLLIER. I will yield for that purpose, and then ask the gentleman not to interrupt me further.

Mr. HARE. I would like to know when these negotiations began between Germany and the United States.

Mr. COLLIER. On the 20th of June, 1931.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLIER. Yes. I am always pleased to yield to my good friend from Kentucky.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I know the gentleman does not want to be in error as to the time the negotiations began. I understood the gentleman to say they began on June 20.

Mr. COLLIER. I thought he asked me when the moratorium was offered. The negotiations began about a month before that.

The State Department, through its attachés, the press, and the country generally, knew of the situation in Germany. Think not, my friends, that a country of 65,000,000 people, occupying the position that Germany does in central Europe, could collapse without dragging down in its fall all the adjacent countries, and think not that such a serious disturbance in Europe would not be felt here across the water. All of our trade relations would have been absolutely destroyed.

It was for these reasons that the President of the United States on the 20th of June made the proposition to the other countries of the world that if they would postpone the payment and acceptance of all debts and amounts owing to them, we would do likewise. This was finally accepted by the countries of Europe.

They talk about this postponement, my friends, as though it were a cancellation of the debt. It is a postponement only by creditors of debtors who are unable to pay. How many Members of this House, I may ask, in their lives have had to have an extension of a certain amount of time on the amount that they owed to banking institutions? It was hinted, and it was generally talked of in the press and in other places, that this means a cancellation of the debt.

The President of the United States before he took action got in touch with the Members of the House and of the Senate. I understand from the testimony of Mr. Mills that over 279 Members of the House, I believe it was, agreed to stand by him in this moratorium.

Now, let us see just what this moratorium is and what this debt postponement, what this renewal, or what this extension of time for one year means.

It is a small document of five sections, and section 1 recites the names of the countries in which the postponements are to be made.

Section 2 simply provides that the deferred payments for next year, instead of being paid in one payment, shall be amortized in 10 annual installments at the rate of 4 per cent.

Section 3 provides that no such agreement shall be entered into by the President of the United States unless it appears to his satisfaction that such government has made or is willing to make an assurance that it will exact from other countries and extend to other countries the same privilege that we have exacted or extended to them.

I want to clear up one matter which seems to have been disturbing the House in regard to a word in line 21, of section 3, the word "reparation." This does not refer to the United States in any way. When the President of the United States made the agreement with the countries of the world, they were to make the same kind of an agreement in reference to the governmental debts of those countries which owed them. No country owes us reparations, and this does not commit us to any reparation plan by which we are willing to have the debts of the foreign governments to us dependent upon collection of reparations from Germany. This simply describes the kind of debts these other countries had among themselves. For instance, if reparations had been taken from the resolution, France would not have been willing to have entered into the arrangement, because a great part of the debt that is owing to France from Germany consists of reparations. It is only descriptive, so the other countries of the world would know what kind of debts they had to make their agreements with in order to comply with the general agreement we were making, in order to stabilize the financial system of Europe, and at the same time place ourselves upon a firmer and a sounder basis.

Now, let us go to section 4, and there may be one line in this section which has disturbed many Members of this House. It disturbed me until it was explained. This is simply put in here for the purpose of excepting Austria and Greece. The line that may need explanation to the Members is line 3, at the top of page 3, in section 4:

> Each agreement authorized by this joint resolution shall be made so that payments of annuities under such agreement shall, unless otherwise provided in the agreement (1) be in accordance with the provisions contained in the agreement made with the government of such country.

Now, why were the words "unless otherwise provided in the agreement" inserted?

Because the countries of Greece and Austria were in a different situation, and this clause related only to those countries, I will explain why this was done.

When the United States was at war with Germany our Government agreed to give to the Government of Greece, which at the time was one of our allies, a commitment amounting to $60,000,000; $18,000,000 of this was paid in commitments to the Republic of Greece.

After $18,000,000 had been paid there was a revolution in Greece. This revolution brought about a change of policy, and after this change the allied governments, including our own, refused to advance more commitments to that country.

A number of years afterwards in 1929, I believe, it was determined in the settlement with Greece that they would loan Greece an additional amount. Greece wished an amount equal to the difference between the $18,000,000 and the $60,000,000, but it was finally determined to loan them $12,000,000.

I want to tell you that I did not support that legislation. I want to say to you that my distinguished colleague on this committee, who was a member of the Debt Funding Commission, did not support that resolution. But it passed the House, and the $12,000,000 additional was loaned to Greece.

The $18,000,000 which Greece borrowed from us at the time when she was our ally is treated like any of the other debts due the United States, and the $12,000,000 loaned Greece afterwards is a different proposition. It was made after the war, and the terms of that settlement remain as they were first made.

Now, let us see about Austria. We did not lend Austria any money. It was testified before the Committee on Ways and Means that there was a condition of suffering and starvation in Austria beyond description. An official high in rank testified before our committee. He related many harrowing details including the statement that out of every thousand babies of a certain tender age over 800 had starved to death.

We loaned them no money, but we had on hand a great quantity of wheat, and we sent them this wheat for which we were secured by Austria's promise to pay. In addition, there was some arrangement whereby the United States received certain receipts.

Sometime after the loan was made Austria got into such a weak condition that in order to prevent the financial structure of the country from collapsing various countries of the world, including the United States, surrendered their liens and took a second mortgage. The amount Austria owes us is small as compared to the debts of many other nations.

For these reasons Austria is exempted from this resolution.

Now, what is the fifth and last section? It is as follows:

> SEC. 5. It is hereby exrpessly declared to be against the policy of Congress that any of the indebtedness of foreign countries to the United States should be in any manner canceled or reduced; and nothing in this joint resolution shall be construed as indicating a contrary policy, or as implying that favorable consideration will be given at any time to a change in the policy hereby declared.

My friends, these debts were made at a time of great stress; they were made when we were engaged in the greatest war of all the ages; they were made at a time when we had 4,000,000 of the young manhood of America either in France ready to face the red storm of German fire and blood and steel or were in America prepared to embark for the scene of conflict.

Our national debt had reached its highest peak sometime after the Civil War, when it was barely as much as two and three-quarter billion dollars. The national debt increased to over $26,000,000,000 during the last war. During the last year and a half of the war we raised from the American people by taxation and by borrowing, over $19,000,000,000.

We were taxing ourselves to the uttermost. These debts were made in good faith, they were honestly made, and we were assured by the debtor countries that the indebtedness would be paid back as soon as they were able to pay it. We cheerfully raised $10,000,000,000 and loaned that sum to our allies on their promise to pay us back dollar for dollar. It was agreed at the time that when we made a bond and sold it to the American people to get the money to lend to our allies, they would give us in return a bond of like tenor and bearing the same rate of interest. There was no talk then of German reparations. All of the countries of the world on our side were engaged in a desperate effort to destroy Germany. We were not a party to the Versailles treaty. I for one make the statement without fear of successful contradiction that no official statement has ever been made by anyone in authority in the United States to the effect that the payment of the foreign debt to us would be in any way dependent upon the payment those countries received in reparations from Germany.

There has been a good deal of talk in the newspapers, there have been hints here and there, that these debts are to be canceled. With the exception of the debt that we owe to Belgium, which perhaps more for sentimental than business reasons I supported, none of the other debt settlements received my approval. I had the honor to have charge of the minority in the consideration of several of those settlements. After making speeches during the war from one end of the country to the other inducing the people to buy Liberty bonds to lend to our allies and assuring them that they would lose no money by the transaction, I did not feel that I was in a position to make a settlement for them in that way. I did not like the interest arrangements, but all of this is neither here nor there. The debts were made. They have been scaled, they have been generously scaled. In some instances these debts have been scaled as far down as 70 per cent. They have been scaled enough, and I for one Member of this House will never agree to a cancellation or a reduction of the debts now owing to us by these foreign countries. [Applause.]

I think the statement in the report of the committee can better explain section 5 than I can. I shall read what the committee says:

> The committee is firmly of the opinion that nothing in the resolution can in any manner be construed as indicating a policy of debt cancellation or reduction, or as committing the United States or Congress to such a policy. In view, however, of repeated statements by opponents of the resolution, the committee feels it desirable to set the matter at rest by the insertion of section 5.

My time is limited, and I am going to hurry and not make the extended talk on the matter as I had intended. But there are several propositions I want to make clear before this House. A great many Members of this House have promised the President of the United States that they were in favor of postponing for one year the debts of the foreign nations in order to avoid the collapse of one of the great countries in Central Europe. Yet there appeared a statement in the press the other day that Great Britain, through her ambassador, had placed in the hands of her fiscal agent in New York the sum of $91,000,000 to be applied as the installment which was due on December 15, and that the French ambassador had placed the amount owed by France in the hands of its fiscal agent, also that the ambassador from Italy had done likewise. This article was signed by one of the newspaper reporters of the city of Washington, Mr. Horan. Mr. Horan was present and the committee requested him to appear. He did. We asked him where he got his information, and he declined to answer, pleading the privilege of a newspaper reporter. Knowing that the ethics of the newspaper profession are very high, and especially so in the city of Washington, we did not press the gentleman, but excused him, as we did not care to place him in the attitude of divulging a confidential communication. But did we let the matter rest there? Your chairman was directed to take the matter up with the Secretary of the Treasury to find out who was the fiscal agent of these countries. He was told that J. P. Morgan & Co. was the fiscal agent of those countries, and that J. P. Morgan had acted for Great Britain and France in 1930 and 1929 in their payments. With the assistance of the Treasury the chairman got in touch with that banking house. Mr. H. P. Davison, of the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co., appeared before the committee. We directed his attention to these newspaper articles and asked him if the Government of France and the Government of England had deposited any money with his firm for that purpose. He stated that his house was the fiscal agent for these countries, and that he knew of no other fiscal agent in America. He said not only had they not done so but those countries had not notified his firm about the matter. He further stated that in the past, some time before the amounts were due, his firm had been notified by these countries in regard to the installments.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLIER. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. But to a subsequent interrogation, Mr. Davison took refuge behind the privilege which he claimed as between a banker and a client, did he not?

Mr. COLLIER. A question was asked Mr. Davison, not by a member of the committee but by a Member of the House, whether the Governments referred to had directed him to pay the money. If I have not quoted the gentleman correctly, I wish the gentleman from Kentucky will correct me. He said if the money was there he would have done it, did he not?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Oh, he said yes; but then he qualified it.

Mr. COLLIER. And was not the further question asked, that if they had just been requested to pay it, whether he would do it; and my recollection is that the gentleman made it plain that if the money was there and they had requested him to pay it, he would have paid it; but, on the bald statement as to whether he would transact their business on credit, or something like that, or whether or not he would have extended them credit at all, he declined to answer. I am just giving the gist of it, and I ask the gentleman from Kentucky if I am not correct.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. After the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM] had come to his rescue and suggested the question of privilege.

Mr. COLLIER. Well, I am just stating the facts as they appear, because there was so much talk. There were statements made before the committee to the effect that these Governments were ready and willing to pay, and that we, notwithstanding the distressed condition of this country, were turning down those requests. I say to you, my friends, that this committee has acted diligently. We have summoned the Secretary of State before us twice on this matter. We have diligently made every inquiry that it was possible to make in order to avoid any criticism that we were trying to rush or hasten this matter through. Any statement made by anyone that those Governments were ready to pay or that any one of those Governments was ready and willing and prepared to pay its installment on December 15 was not substantiated, for after careful and diligent inquiry there is not found one word of corroboration in the hearings before this committee.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLIER. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. As a matter of fact, did we not show before the committee a statement appearing on the front page of the Washington Post to the effect that the British ambassador, the French ambassador, and the Italian ambassador had all announced that they were ready to make those payments on the 15th? Was that not shown to the committee?

Mr. COLLIER. There was an article from a newspaper read to the committee.

Mr. RANKIN. Yes, sir; and it was on the front page of the Washington Post.

Mr. COLLIER. On yesterday, on the front page of the United States Daily, appeared a great speech made by a good Mississippian, and it is called a speech made by Mr. COLLIER, but it was made by the gentleman from my own State [Mr. RANKIN]. So the gentleman can not rely on everything he sees in the newspapers.

Mr. RANKIN. Let me further ask the gentleman whether or not any inquiry was made of the French Embassy, the Italian Embassy, or the British Embassy as to whether or not those statements were correct?

Mr. COLLIER. The statement was made that this money was paid into the hands of the fiscal agents. We went to the banking firm to whom they said the money was paid and their representative said it had not been paid. What more could we do?

Mr. RANKIN. I was the Member of the House who asked those questions. When I asked him if as fiscal agent of those countries the house of J. P. Morgan & Co. had been requested to make those payments to the Government on December 15, under the circumstances, he would have paid it, he declined to answer.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLIER. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Regardless of whether they had paid this money to their fiscal agents, I would like to have the gentleman tell the House whether or not there is a syllable in this record that was offered to our committee to indicate that either England, France, or Italy was unable to pay or had expressed any desire for an extension of time.

Mr. COLLIER. I do not know that there was. I would say that as far as I know and as far as the record shows and as far as we could find out by diligent inquiry, by having the Under Secretary of the Treasury before us three or four times, by having the Secretary of State there in person several times, by putting newspaper reporters on the witness stand, by sending to New York for the members of the firm to whom this newspaper reporter said they had paid the money; I say, after all that diligent inquiry we have not found one scintilla of evidence to show that those Governments were ready to pay.

When the gentleman asks if the great country of England would not pay, I am not going to stand upon this floor and say that Great Britain, with its immense possessions, with its wonderful resources, if we had demanded the pound of flesh, would not have been ready to pay. I am not going to make that statement. [Applause.] Nor will I make that statement of France, nor will I make that statement of any of them. We have had confidential communications, not of a nature that some may fear—to try to hide anything—but confidential communications. I am a Democrat. We had a Republican Secretary of State and a Republican Under Secretary of the Treasury before us, and I make the statement, after having been on this committee for 18 years, I never saw more or franker statements than were made by those two gentlemen. They answered every question that was asked them. We have our troubles here; we have our own banks failing. Several of them failed in my State recently. We have terribly distressing conditions here, and there are terrible conditions abroad. It is a terrible situation for a bank in a local community to fail. It causes suffering and sorrow and distress. It causes more suffering and more sorrow and more distress when a large bank in a large community fails. Our hearts go out in sympathy to those depositors who have lost their earnings; but, my friends, visualize if you can when these banks fail that many of them have been reopened. The strong arm of our Government has stepped in and they have done what they could to reopen them. There is behind us the Federal reserve bank with its millions of reserves; but, visualize this, now: Suppose our great Federal reserve system were to topple and fall, what condition then would every bank in America be in?

It was the failure of Austria's reserve system, if I might call it that name, which precipitated the crisis in both Austria and Germany; and it was the collapse of the German Reichsbank, which corresponds to our Federal reserve system, that was sought to be averted by the offer of this debt postponement.

Think you, my friends, that if any great cataclysm had occurred over there—notwithstanding the fact that we are over 3,000 miles away—it would not have been reflected over here? The committee did not believe that in this time of universal distress, when that great nation was on the verge of financial collapse, when its financial structure was about to fall, and in its fall bring down with it neighboring countries—the committee did not feel justified in saying that at that time we would exact the pound of flesh from any nation in Europe or elsewhere. [Applause.] Does that answer the gentleman?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I am waiting for an answer.

Mr. COLLIER. What was the gentleman's question?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The question was: Was there any testimony before the committee that they were not able to pay or that they had any desire not to pay?

Mr. COLLIER. I will answer that in this way: The debt was due on December 15. When the gentleman from Kentucky or myself or any other Member of this House has a note in bank which he is unable to pay, he goes to the bank and tells them he can not pay. However, I will say this: That if we had insisted, I believe England would have paid. I think that answers the question.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I will ask the gentleman from Mississippi if there is any proof in this record or any testimony that England, France, or Italy sought the edict or mandate of the President on June 20 declaring this moratorium?

Mr. COLLIER. This is an American proposal.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The gentleman bases his statement on the letter from Hindenburg and the President's message, but there is no proof that any of the other nations affected sought the moratorium.

Mr. COLLIER. But there is proof that when the moratorium was offered they eagerly accepted it. Whether it was right or whether it was wrong, it was an earnest effort to stabilize the credit of the world in order that we ourselves should not be dragged down, and I want to make this assertion: That there is testimony to the effect and there is evidence of a certain nature—because some things can not be certain—that this moratorium, when it was offered, prevented the collapse which was impending. At that time it was evident that within three or four days there would be a general cessation of payments in that great country of both private and public debts. It gave those countries a chance to breathe. It is like giving a stimulant to a failing heart. It may not effect a cure, but it revives the patient and gives him a chance to breathe and get on his feet again. [Applause.] I think it did good, and the immediate result was a rise in the prices of commodities. Cotton went up $5 a bale.

Mr. HAWLEY, Mr. VINSON of Kentucky, and Mr. MAY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Mississippi suspend in order to permit the Chair to make a statement with reference to the order of procedure? Just before the gentleman from Mississippi finished his last statement there were three Members on the floor seeking to interrupt the gentleman at the same time. The rule of the House and the committee requires that when a gentleman desires to interrupt a speaker he shall first address the Chair and secure the permission of the Speaker or the chairman before he can interrupt the speaker. I hope members of the committee, in order to carry out orderly procedure, will remember that rule.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. COLLIER. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. HAWLEY. The fact that these nations signed this agreement and that they have not collected anything from their debtors since July 31 of this year is an indication that they expected this agreement to go through and an implied request on their part that they should not be required to pay.

Mr. COLLIER. I think it could be so considered. They entered into the agreement, and the main purpose was an earnest endeavor on the part of sovereign countries to prevent the further withdrawal of gold from Germany. Germany had gotten into the habit of doing a great part of its business on short-term loans, and when this lack of confidence occurred it was extremely difficult to renew those short-term loans. When the gentleman wants to know who first made the proposal I will answer him by saying the United States itself, and the fact is that the countries he has mentioned eagerly entered into the agreement.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. COLLIER. I yield.

Mr. MAY. I merely want to ask this question, and in asking it I want to say it is not for the purpose of heckling the speaker but for information. When I came to this Congress I came here favorably inclined toward this proposal. The question has been discussed among Members of this House in my presence and it has been repeated that there was absolutely no request from some of the governments, to begin with, for the extension of this time. I want to ask the gentleman from Mississippi whether or not there is anything in the proceedings or hearings before the committee as to who did initiate this proposal?

Mr. COLLIER. I think I can answer the gentleman very definitely. It was initiated by the President of the United States and I do not think there were any other requests, and it was initiated by the President of the United States because of information received through agencies of this country abroad. It was not only on the 20th of June but for six weeks back that the administration had knowledge, through our agencies abroad, of what was going on. As to whether any of the other countries asked for it there is no evidence in the hearings and I do not think that is material to this issue.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLIER. Yes.

Mr. COX. Referring to the question originally propounded by the gentleman from Kentucky, a member of your committee, did it not appear that all of the other powers had agreed upon this proposal and that therefore an inquiry into the ability of the other governments to pay did not appear to be pertinent to the issue that was before the committee?

Mr. COLLIER. Absolutely. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed 47 minutes.

Mr. COLLIER. I will take only three minutes more.

Mr. ESLICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLIER. Yes.

Mr. ESLICK. Is it not true that this postponement agreement applies to several countries to whom Germany is in no way indebted?

Mr. COLLIER. Yes. However, I do not think that has anything to do with it.

Mr. ESLICK. But the moratorium applies to nations which are in no way dependent upon Germany.

Mr. COLLIER. Absolutely. Now, I have only two minutes more and I have talked longer than I intended.

I want to say, in conclusion, I believe this is a matter that is nonpartisan. I believe it is an earnest effort to try to get the country out of the depressing condition it is now in. There have been a great many hints and innuendoes about secret things done here and there. The committee has gone to the bottom of them, and in no instance has any one of these hints or charges been sustained. [Applause.]

Speaking for myself, I believe this is a matter that far transcends any question of partisanship. I made this statement some time ago, and I am willing to repeat it now: Whenever the President of the United States, though I belong to an opposite party, brings in a matter which I believe is for the best interests of the American people I am going to support it and stand by it regardless of whence it comes. [Applause.]

I certainly intend no disrespect to the distinguished gentlemen who are opposing this resolution, because I have the highest personal regard for them, and I have the highest opinion of their ability, and I certainly mean no disrespect to them when I say it strikes me, my friends, there are two ways of looking at this question, and two ways only. To paraphrase an old poem:

To every man and nation sometimes comes the moment to decide
In the strife for better government to take the big or little side.

To-day, my friends, in conclusion, I am going to take what I believe to be the big side. I intend to support the resolution. [Applause.]

I reserve the remainder of my time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this is not a partisan matter and I am not going to discuss it in the light of partisanship. I want to say that I am not the keeper of the conscience or the judgment of any man on this floor, but I say to you, frankly, that rising above partisanship it is my humble conviction that every Member of the Congress ought to cast his vote on this important matter for the good of his country and not to help or to hinder any political party.

My friend the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER], chairman of the committee, made a very good speech in a way. His speech reminded me of a negro down in Texas who was preaching a sermon, and said: "Brothers and sisters, my sermon to-day will be divided into three parts. The first part you will understand and I won't understand; the second part I will understand and you won't understand; and the third part neither of us will understand." [Laughter.]

The parallel ceases in that the gentleman's speech was not divided into three parts, as Gaul was, but was divided into two parts. The first part was on their side of the question and the second part was on our side of the question. There can not be any doubt about that to those of you who followed the gentleman.

My friends, this is a nonpartisan matter. I am going to ask now, and I am going to pause for an answer, because I am going to deal fairly with you—I want every Member in this House to-day who has read the hearings on this bill to hold up his hand. I want somebody to check on me. I want it to go in the RECORD that when I made this request not a single hand went up; and I want to say to you, following that, my friends, that any man who will vote for this proposition without having read the hearings on this resolution has but one parallel in all the history of the world, and that was when the blessed Master said, "I have not seen such great faith; no, not in Israel."

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. A statement like the one the gentleman just made was severely denounced as demagogic a few days ago from the gentleman's own side. We are here on the floor of the House trying to listen to the debate and so far as I know the hearings have only been available to the membership of the House since noon. Let us be fair to the membership of the House. That statement, I think, is absolutely unfair, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. As a matter of fact, for the information of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS] the hearings are not available at this time. There is one pamphlet available, but the testimony before the committee has not been printed and made available.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. Sit down. I do not yield further. I want to say that when this resolution was brought up here we were limited to four hours. If they will

"unlax" themselves and stay in session to-morrow and Monday and Tuesday, as they ought to do, and give me the five hours I requested, then I will yield to the gentleman or to anybody else, but until that time comes, I do not want anyone else to interrupt me.

I say to you now another thing—not a hand went up indicating that you have read the hearings. I want to say this to you, gentlemen, I am opposed to this resolution, but if any man in the Congress of the United States, in this Hall or out of this Hall will show me where there is one syllable of evidence produced before the committee to the effect that the nations mentioned in this resolution ever asked for this extension and that they are not able to pay, I will vote for it. Now, put up or shut up. You can not do it. The fact of the matter is that this whole thing was not inspired, spontaneously, overnight.

I have here a clipping from the Washington Herald where they talk about the President of the United States. Reading here in the Herald—and I dare any man to deny it—the text is "the bankers' proposal."

When did this thing occur? I have to hit this thing only in the high spots, because I am going to be generous to gentlemen who oppose this in giving them time.

Here is the Washington Herald of December 17, 1931, where Mr. Hearst publishes a letter from Bache, in which he says that he had a memorandum of some views in regard to the German reparations.

When was that? October 21, 1930. He says that an extensive campaign would be necessary in this country.

Campaign! That is what it is, a campaign by international bankers, and every time a Member of the House votes for a moratorium you are increasing the tax on every husband, wife, and child in your district, and your people are going to hold you accountable.

On one occasion a man was driving cattle along the road. There was a young calf on wobbly legs that strayed from its mother and ran down the road. The old man ran after him but failed to catch him. The old man threw his hat down and said, "Go it, you darn fool, but you are going to be sorry when supper time comes."

The membership of the House are going to find out, when they go back to their districts and meet the farmer. He will say, "Well, I see you granted a moratorium for Germany." "Yes. How are you getting along?" The farmer will say, "The land bank closed me out and my wife and children are out." I want to say to you that you can not afford to do it.

Now, listen to this. The article goes on to say with a view that an intensive campaign will be necessary in this country in order to influence the Washington atmosphere and educate the man in the street.

I have tried cases in court, and I think I know how to judge the testimony of witnesses.

Mr. Bache says he had no such idea in his mind. Why did he utter it? A man can not utter a thing that is not in his mind. That was in his heart, to create an atmosphere in Washington. Mr. Hearst in the letter absolutely comes out and repudiates it and refuses to do it.

Now, if any man will show me in the hearings one syllable of testimony that any nation mentioned in the resolution has testified that it is not able to pay or that it took the initiative in this matter, I will quit speaking and vote for your resolution.

You can not do it. I say to you frankly, as a practitioner at the bar for many years, that if this case was brought into a civil court on the testimony you have here, it would terminate in an instructed verdict for the defendant. If I were representing the defendant, I would get up and move the testimony of the plaintiff was not sufficient, that he had not made out a case, and the court would give me an instructed verdict, and it would not be disturbed by any higher court in any State in the United States, and you know it. I defy you to show the evidence. Not only that, but take the speech of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER].

The first part of it was a reiteration of the speech of Ogden Mills. I have a very high regard for Mr. Ogden Mills. We always compliment the boy who comes up from poverty and is successful, but I say that the boy who comes from riches and applies himself is also worthy of compliment. He is one of the brightest men in the United States. But take his testimony as a whole and read it, and you will see that it is nothing but a great oratorical display about the conditions that existed in Germany in June, 1931. All of the testimony is to that effect. There is no testimony about the conditions now. As Sam Jones, the great Georgia evangelist, said, "I am not talking about the sweet bye and bye, but I am talking about the nasty now and now." Why can not we have testimony as to the condition of these nations and their ability to pay at this time?

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. JONES. I notice a statement in the minority report that France did not accede to the proposition unconditionally; that she got some advantage. Just how much did that amount to?

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. I would be very glad to answer that question, but I am going to leave it to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON] when he makes his speech. I have other matters on my mind and I must hurry along. We worked in my office last night until the hands of the clock reached 12, because they said that we must get this report in. Oh, yes; the world would come to an end if we did not ratify this, and yet every man in the House knows that the Senate of the United States will not act upon it before the holidays. You know that you are wasting time in rushing here and not giving the Members an opportunity to read the hearings and inform themselves on the issues involved in this matter. [Applause.]

Let us go out of the hearings because you have to get out of them in order to get the testimony. I say to you frankly that in all my practice of law in this country, and in my service in Congress, I never saw such a side-stepping by witness in all my life. They brought forth here a representative of J. P. Morgan & Co. When he came before our committee he stood up in this way like a minister going to perform a marriage ceremony. We asked him a few questions, and he dodged them. It reminded me of a crazy man who said to an audience, "I am going to show you that I am a great artist, and here is my great painting." He held up a blank page. He said that this was a picture of the Children of Israel Crossing the Red Sea as they were being pursued by Pharoah. Someone in the audience said, "Where are the Children of Israel?" He replied that they had crossed over and were on the other side. Then the man said, "Where is the Red Sea?" The crazy man replied, "It has been driven back." The next question was, "Where is Pharaoh?" and the artist replied, "Why, he has not come in sight." [Laughter.] That is absolutely a comparison as to the testimony that that man rendered.

I voted against every debt settlement that has been made in this country. The Washington News says in its issue of the 12th instant:

> As a matter of fact we have already canceled the debts from 25 to 80 cents on the dollar, a total cancellation of about $7,000,000,000. That $7,000,000,000 does not grow on trees; it has to be paid by the hard-pressed American taxpayers, by the mortgage-ridden farmer and the wage-cut worker and the near-bankrupt business man.
> When the American taxpayer consented to take that $7,000,000,000 loaf off the European taxpayer, he assumed that the European taxpayer was too poor to pay for luxuries in the form of giant navies and armies. But since that debt cancellation, Europe has gone on spending more on armaments. Those European armaments in effect are being paid for by the American taxpayer. And in the case of Great Britain, the American taxpayer is not only paying for a large British Navy but in turn is paying more for an American Navy to compete with that larger British Navy.

If those nations over there want to spend their money for war purposes, they are not going to get any help from the United States. The fact is that they have expended practically two billions of dollars in the last year for that purpose. Do you know how much money that is? We get lost in figures.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. Yes; I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. I don't want to take up the gentleman's time, but on the point of Germany's ability to pay, on the front page of the Washington Post this morning there is an Associated Press dispatch from Basel, Switzerland, in which it is stated that Germany has increased her budgetary expenses, and that means her yearly expense, by the sum of $925,000,000, between 1926 and 1929. It is stated that $375,000,000 of this amount resulted from increases in salaries, $175,000,000 for various purposes, and $250,000,000 for unemployment insurance. That is what is called a dole. That means Germany has increased those expenses $800,000,000, of which the American people were never informed until this morning.

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. Very well. I have to hurry along. I hope nobody else interrupts me. That again reminds me of the fellow in Texas who was driving an unruly pair of work oxen down a sandy road. One of them laid down on the ground. He could not get him to start, but finally he got him up by some persuasive means and he got him to make a lunge. When he did that he stopped. Finally the man just walked around and caught the ears of the oxen and he jammed their heads together and said, "Durn you, I have got more sense than both of you."

When the war was over, Germany started in to win by diplomacy what they had lost in war, and I have here a clipping from a reputable newspaper man in this country—and newspaper men know their onions—who said that over in Germany the budget was doctored up in order to make it appear that they were downtrodden and hard pressed. I would like to talk longer, but time is running fast. I have many things that I would like to mention, but I must be liberal with those who are dependent upon me for time. I call attention to the fact that on page 8 of our report we set out the amount of money that these nations have been spending.

Remember, they are able to spend that for armaments. They are able to spend that for war. They are able to do that in times of peace, but they are not able to pay the United States, according to the President, the amount of money herein mentioned.

This resolution was introduced on the 14th of this month. We have had only three days' hearings. I say to you that the President of the United States was not acting in good faith when he did it. I say to you that when he sent that wire to the Members of Congress, he had already acted. I received one of them. This is what he said: "I consulted the leaders." In other words, I suppose you just feed out of their hands. He is mistaken in the temper of the American people. Every man in this Congress who is feeding out of some leader's hand is degrading himself. I am like Andy Gump, "I wear no man's collar," and I am thinking for myself.

The President of the United States sent that wire down there. It was a cheapening of his dignity; it was a lowering of the great dignity of the office of the President of the United States, and his sympathies have been more for the other countries than for this country. I had in my mail this morning a paper showing the voters over there in Great Britain, and in that was Mr. Hoover, stating his address Red House, Campden Hill, when he was an elector over there. Red House, I understand, is situated in Horton Street, Kensington, but comes under Campden Hill for voting purposes. I am not trying to vent any spleen against Mr. Hoover, because I always dislike to jump on the fellow that is down and out, and he seems to be, but I am talking to you about the facts that present themselves to me as an American citizen and as a Congressman to vote my conviction.

When you pass this moratorium you are increasing the tax burden on the men, women, and children of your districts. It is right in here—$2 for each one. When you go back home, if you want to vote for this, I will tell you "good-by" finally when the session adjourns, and I hope at some future date you will reform and come back, but you can not go out and defend it. You are raising the tax burdens of this country, which we are going to have to increase in this Congress, when the Treasury of the United States is $2,000,000,000 in the red.

My friends, I appeal to you as a patriotic duty to consider all the evidence in this matter and cast your vote for the good of your country. The international bankers may conspire, the President may disappoint, but truth will march ever onward, sovereign and undying. [Applause.]

The President's message to this Congress has been interpreted by the best thinkers and writers of this country as a move for the further reductions and final cancellation of the war debts. If the President did not have that in mind, why did he propose the revival of the War Debt Commission? The Hon. Claude G. Bowers, in a recent issue of the Washington Times, in a very able article headed, "America, Pack Horse for World War Debts," says:

> We do not know to what extent or if, indeed, at all, the President, in his secret conversation with the representatives of England, France, and Italy, has compromised the American position on the debts. The position of France and all other nations owing us billions is that they will reduce the reparations in proportion as we reduce our debts. That does not take a penny out of the pockets of those nations; it takes all the money out of the pocket of the American people.

In another very able article in a different issue of the same paper, Mr. Bowers says:

> Anyone reading the message and unfamiliar with the purpose of these presidential communications would imagine that he was reporting "not on the state of the Union," so much as on the conditions of Europe. This disposition to stand in the midst of the wreckage wrought by the economic stupidity and the deceptive inflations of the market, to which this and a previous administration consciously and deliberately contributed mightily, and look across the sea has come to be an obsession of the administration. Why this harping about depression elsewhere? Hasn't the administration yet discovered any desperate depression here at home?

Continuing, Mr. Bowers says:

> It is going to take some time to balance our own Budget; and it will be longer before we again smugly and sternly call on Europe to balance hers. Certainly we are in no condition to play the benefactor of mankind by taking over the debts of other nations and paying them out of the pockets of our own people.
> There is not a scintilla of doubt that the administration, in its policies and through its conversations with the debtor nations, is moving toward further reductions or, what it amounts to in the end, the transfer of the debts of other nations to the taxpayers of this country This plan, ready or in the making, is to be imposed upon us because our bankers have made extravagant private loans in Europe which can not be readily liquidated if the people in the nations where the loans were placed are to be taxed to repay what they borrowed from the American Government. The "butcher, the baker, the candlestick maker" are to be taxed to pay the debts of foreign governments so that the private loans may be paid at good interest to the American banker.
> The London News-Chronicle, commenting on the revelations on American conditions in the President's message, concludes that "the United States is a very sick country," and the London Morning Telegraph says: "President Hoover unfolded a melancholy story, showing that the Federal Treasury is in a far worse position than the British Exchequer."

I conclude, Mr. Speaker, by submitting the minority report, which is a clear statement of this entire matter:

CONSTITUTION IGNORED

The President of the United States did not have the constitutional right to take the action which he did in June of this year with respect to the moratorium. Under the Constitution of the United States, this was a matter to be determined by Congress in session, with proper communication thereon by the President of the United States, together with full facts of existent circumstances. The President did not regard this matter of sufficient moment to call Congress into special session to consider same.

The conclusion of the President was reached after several weeks of investigation and consideration. No reason has been shown to excuse the usual constitutional procedure for the consideration of a matter of this importance.

NO NECESSITY FOR MORATORIUM

The necessity for the deferring of the payments of the intergovernmental debts to the United States by the 16 foreign powers affected by this resolution was not proven to the satisfaction of those subscribing to this minority report.

The selfsame arguments heard upon the consideration of the debt settlements advocated by the administration were heard anew. Generalities in respect of the financial structure of Germany were given voice. Germany was said to be unable to pay her reparations to seven or eight of these foreign countries affected by this measure. The other seven or eight countries affected by this resolution do not receive any sum from Germany in reparations (the names of these nations are not set forth herein because of the fact that the hearings in which they were to be inserted are not available to us at this time).

Thus, this resolution would defer the payment of moneys to this country from seven or eight nations for value received even though nothing is payable to them from Germany.

Germany is the nation to be helped. The sum of $6,000,000 is the only sum due by Germany to this country. No one even suggested that England, France, and Italy were not ready, willing, and able to pay their obligations to us on the due date. These three countries would pay to us during the fiscal year 1932 the sum of $224,227,125. The total amount of the payments deferred, including Germany's $6,000,000, is $252,566,803. Upon Thursday, December 10, 1931, Mr. Chamberlain, Chancellor of the Exchequer, is reported to have assured the House of Commons that all British foreign obligations could be and would be met.

No evidence was adduced before us that any of the foreign nations affected were financially unable and unwilling to make these payments. On the other hand, the nations affected by this resolution expended approximately $2,000,000,000 for armaments and war preparations within the last fiscal year.

We quote from the New York Times dated Sunday, August 2, 1931:

What nations spend on arms

Austria	$14,507,320
Belgium	33,303,200
Czechoslovakia	51,189,000
Estonia	5,520,000
Finland	16,457,500
France	466,960,000
Germany	171,923,040
British Empire	726,731,065
Greece	21,340,800
Hungary	20,200,000
Italy	248,946,500
Latvia	7,860,000
Lithuania	5,680,000
Poland	92,072,000
Rumania	53,647,200
Yugoslavia	50,458,000
Total	1,986,799,625

It is very interesting to note that when the sums so expended within one year by the British Empire, France, and Italy on arms are segregated from this list, the total makes the startling sum of $1,424,637,565. It is peculiarly pertinent when we again remind the House that these three nations would only pay within the present fiscal year the sum of $224,227,125 upon their indebtedness to us.

THE PRESIDENTIAL ACTION WAS A STEP TOWARD FURTHER CONCESSION TO FOREIGN DEBTORS

This is a forerunner and a curtain raiser to debt cancellation or another moratorium. Be not deceived. Read the President's message. Read this resolution and read the hearings.

The President in his message to the present Congress recommended the re-creation of the World War Debt Commission.

Mr. Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury, in what is reported to be a statement clarifying President Hoover's recommendations to Congress, on December 11, gave forth a public statement which is quoted in full as follows:

MR. MELLON DEFINES NATION'S POSITION ON DEBT CANCELLATION

"There should be no misinterpretation as to the administration's recommendations to Congress relating to the debts due us from foreign governments and the re-creation of the World War Foreign Debt Commission. The administration is opposed to cancellation. No recommendation made carries any such implication.

"It is, however, the duty of those in authority to deal with realities, and there is no escaping the fact that some of our debtors can not meet in full the payments due us until there has been a substantial measure of economic recovery and that the position of others is so changed as to call for consideration of their present situation in the light of existing circumstances.

"Our debt settlements were effected on the basis of the capacity of the debtors to pay. As the President said in his statement of June 20, 'As the basis of the settlement of these debts was the capacity under normal conditions of the debtor to pay, we should be consistent with our own policies and principles if we take into account the abnormal situation now existing in the world.'

"Take the case of Great Britain, our best customer, which even in the depression year 1930 took $678,000,000 worth of American agricultural and industrial products. The economic and financial changes of the past year have immensely increased the value of her payments to us. The series of events through which Great Britain was forced off the gold standard are too recent to require enumeration.

"To-day the pound sterling is selling at $3.315 to the pound, which is a 32 per cent discount as compared with last year when it stood at tariff parity or $4.866. All debts to Great Britain from foreign governments, except reparation payments, which are not being collected at all this year, and are not likely to be collected in full next year, are payable in sterling. Her debt to us is payable in gold dollars. The combined effect of these unfavorable factors results in an enormously increased burden for the people of Great Britain.

"Payments during the present fiscal year will serve to exemplify the magnitude of the additional burden.

"With the pound sterling at par, the British Treasury needs 32,800,000 pounds in order to pay us $159,500,000. With the pound sterling at the rate at which it sold on December 10, 1931, it would take 48,100,000 pounds or an increase of 15,300,000 pounds, or 47 per cent. Or in other words, the burden on the British taxpayers is increased by almost one-half.

"When the British debt settlement was made it was estimated that its present value at 4½ per cent was 80 per cent of the total amount due prior to funding. If the amount to be raised in pound sterling to meet the obligation to us in dollars is increased by 47 per cent, it becomes apparent that from the standpoint of the British taxpayer he is asked to meet not the obligation as established by our debt commission but an amount considerably in excess of such obligation.

"Nothing could more forcibly illustrate the changed situation which places on the executive as well as the legislative branch of Government the duty of reexamining the obligations of our debtors and their ability to meet them during a period of world-wide economic depression.

"Does anyone believe that Austria or Hungary should be asked to pay the installments due from them in view of the extraordinarily straitened circumstances in which the people of those two countries find themselves and great difficulty which they experience in obtaining foreign exchange for the purpose of carrying on even the minimum of effectual commerce with the rest of the world?

"Does anyone believe that Germany should be asked by the United States Government to meet her payments on the costs of the army of occupation when such a demand by us must be inevitably followed by demands of other creditors to pay her reparations in full?

"These instances should suffice to demonstrate that to stand on the letter of our bond and to refuse to investigate or to consider the facts is to fail in our responsibility to the American people whom we represent and to the debtors whose capacity to pay we ourselves undertook to determine.

"What intelligent business man or banker would blindly refuse to investigate or to consider the altered circumstances of a debtor whose unsecured obligation he held? The situation of our debtors has been immensely altered during the course of the last two years. New questions in relation to these debts are bound to arise in the course of the next few months. The Congress should be in a position through a commission created by it and composed in part of its own Members to ascertain what the facts actually are and to deal with these new problems as they arise.

"It is with such thoughts as these in mind that the President recommended the re-creation of the World War Foreign Debt Commission. I am confident that upon mature consideration this recommendation will commend itself to the Congress."

The administration bill was introduced by Mr. COLLIER, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, by request of the Treasury. This is the formal way of presenting the views of the Executive without in any manner binding the gentleman who would introduce it. It was the bill upon which the hearings were held. It is House Joint Resolution No. 123. We print it in full as follows:

[H. J. Res. 123, Seventy-second Congress, first session]

Joint resolution to authorize the postponement of amounts payable to the United States from foreign governments during the fiscal year 1932, and their repayment over a 10-year period beginning July 1, 1933

"Resolved etc., That in the case of each of the following countries: Austria, Belgium, Czechoslovakia, Estonia, Finland, France, Germany, Great Britain, Greece, Hungary, Italy, Latvia, Lithuania, Poland, Rumania, and Yugoslavia, the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is authorized to make, on behalf of the United States, an agreement with the government of such country to postpone the payment of any amount payable during the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1931, by such country to the United States in respect of its bonded indebtedness to the United States, except that in the case of Germany the agreement shall relate only to amounts payable by Germany to the United States during such fiscal year in respect of the costs of the Army of Occupation.

"SEC. 2. Each such agreement on behalf of the United States shall provide for the payment of the postponed amounts, with interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum beginning July 1, 1933, in 10 equal annuities, the first to be paid during the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1933, and one during each of the 9 fiscal years following, each annuity to be payable in one or more installments.

"SEC. 3. No such agreement shall be made with the government of any country unless it appears to the satisfaction of the President that such government has made, or has given satisfactory assurances of willingness and readiness to make, with the government of each of the other countries indebted to such country in respect of war, relief, or reparation debts, an agreement in respect of such debt substantially similar to the agreement authorized by this joint resolution to be made with the government of such creditor country on behalf of the United States.

"SEC. 4. Each agreement authorized by this joint resolution shall be made so that payments of annuities under such agreement shall, unless otherwise provided in the agreement (1) be in accordance with the provisions contained in the agreement made with the government of such country under which the payment to be postponed is payable, and (2) be subject to the same terms and conditions as payments under such original agreement."

It will be noted that what appears as section 5 in the resolution under discussion (probably) was not included in the administration measure.

This section reads as follows:

"SEC. 5. It is hereby expressly declared to be against the policy of Congress that any of the indebtedness of foreign countries to the United States should be in any manner canceled or reduced and nothing in this joint resolution shall be construed as indicating a contrary policy, or as implying favorable consideration at any time to a change in the policy hereby declared."

It may be that, with the knowledge of the sentiment in Congress and throughout the country against favoring foreign nations over our own country, the administration at this late date decides that moratoriums, debt reductions, and debt cancellations, at the expense of the American taxpayer are not particularly popular. In any event, Congress is given the opportunity to give expression to its policy in this regard. We heartily concur in this amendment to the administration bill.

THE TIME ELEMENT

It was stated to us that the President reached his conclusion to initiate the moratorium on the 17th or 18th of June, 1931. His statement relative thereto was given publication on June 20, 1931. The wires to the Members receiving them were dated June 23, 1931. As we have noted, more than five and one-half months elapsed before Congress convened. No special session was called to consider this measure. Congress assembled Monday, December 7, 1931, and the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee were duly elected on that date. The administration measure was forwarded to Chairman COLLIER and immediately introduced by him on Monday, December 14. The hearings begun on the 15th were had in the mornings and afternoons of the 15th, 16th, and 17th. The bill was reported out, introduced in the House a few minutes before its adjournment on this date, December 17. It will be printed to-night and will be made available with the reports thereon to the Members to-morrow.

The hearings, while not so extensive in the testimony of the witnesses appearing before the committee, are not available at this time to the members of the committee nor to the Members of the House. There were considerable references made to documentary evidence which was agreed to be filed as a part of the evidence in support of this measure. These were not made available to the committee, and we are completely at a loss to know their contents.

We are in hearty accord with the dispatch of business. We have no criticism whatever of the manner in which the distinguished chairman of this committee has conducted the hearings, but we do submit that the membership of the committee should have had time to read the evidence and the documents called for by the evidence before preparing the reports, and the membership of the House should have had the opportunity to read the record and to digest it before being called on to vote on this momentous question.

CHANGE IN TERMS OF PROPOSAL

The final agreement reached on July 6, 1931, differed materially from that announced by President Hoover on June 20, 1931.

The initial proposal of the President, concerning which he sought the position of Members of Congress subsequent to the time when he had reached his conclusion, provided "postponement for one year of all intergovernmental debts."

It is patent that the postponement sought in this legislation is not for one year. It is true that the legislation treats of the payment of the debts for a 1-year period, but this deferred payment is strung out over a period of 10 years. It was admitted by the spokesman for the administration, Mr. Mills, that the President did not have in mind on June 20, 1931, the payment over a 10-year period of the indebtedness due for this fiscal year.

Further, as evidenced by the above quotation, the postponement was to be "of all intergovernmental debts." In the agreement finally reached, France refused to accede to that proposal. All unconditional reparations due France from Germany are to be paid. There can be no doubt but that such condition is a deviation from the President's proposal. France is given a decided advantage in this respect.

In conclusion we desire to call the attention of the Members of the House to the fact that our revenues amount to only about one-half the amount of the expenditures of the Government; that we have a large deficit and it is growing by leaps and bounds and to withhold the collection of this $252,000,000 means that it must be raised in taxation from the people of the United States, amounting to more than $2 for every man, woman, and child in the United States. We commend the equitable maxim known to every lawyer—we should be just to the American people before we are generous to the peoples of Europe.

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON] 30 minutes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the House, I regret to occupy my present position. It is always a matter of regret for me to part company with my friends of the Ways and Means Committee, to which I have so recently been elected. However, this is a nonpolitical measure. Our conclusions upon it should be solely directed by our judgment and our conscience. I made every honest effort within my being to support this resolution.

I recognized the position I occupied on the committee, being the youngest member on the committee in point of service, and I tried to go along. But the record was made up, when the testimony of the witnesses was heard, when the case went to the committee as a jury to be determined by them. I could not support it. I state my position here and now, without criticism of any gentleman on the committee or any other member for their conclusions. I just could not support it.

In the first place, in my opinion the constitutional procedure was not followed by the distinguished gentleman who is the President of our country. It was said by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means that President Hoover initiated this proposition. I doubt that such really happened. Germany and men whose private interests were at stake initiated it. It was current conversation for months prior to Mr. Hoover considering it in May, 1931. The intensive study of it by our Government was said to have begun in May, 1931. The President had six weeks before reaching his conclusion on June 20, in which he could have called into extra session the Seventy-second Congress. When it suited his purpose he had called into extra session another Congress, the Seventy-first. He did not choose this constitutional course.

It is very, very strange, my friends, that his formal statement, or declaration, to the world happened to be issued on the same day that President von Hindenburg cabled the President of the United States. It seems that cable was timed to a nicety. The President reached his conclusion without the assistance of the Congress of the United States.

I know that in these latter days some say, "What is the Constitution between friends?" But it is a grave danger for men who claim friendship for the Constitution to ignore it for any reason. Congress should have been called into extra session. This matter could have been considered by Congress in the same time it has now taken. If such great hurry was required to pass the bill, certainly it could have been done in short shift in an extra session and a delay of almost six months avoided.

I have no criticism to offer for that lovable, genial gentleman who has rendered distinguished service as chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. COLLIER]. He is my good friend. I love and esteem him for his worth. But there were some things that happened in that committee hearing that I think you ought to know about. It is my purpose to tell you some of them.

When Mr. Horan, a reporter, was haled before the committee, information was sought of him as to the source of his information that 9 or 11 foreign countries had made deposits with their fiscal agents in this country with which to pay the moneys due December 15, 1931. He stated that the ethics of his profession would not permit him to speak. When Mr. Davison, the representative of J. P. Morgan & Co., appeared and Congressman RANKIN queried him, Mr. Davison took refuge behind the privilege of a banker and client. That was a new privilege to me. When a gentleman representing a district in the State of Pennsylvania sought to appear before our committee and give evidence upon this bill, a man who for 17 long years has served that district in Congress, a gentleman who, for 8 or 10 years and until control of the House changed, occupied the position of chairman of the great Committee on Banking and Currency, a gentleman, I might say, who, for all these years stood high in the citadel of the Republican Party, a gentleman who brought many bills to the House representing the banking interests of this country, especially the branch-banking interests—when that gentleman endeavored to appear before the committee, it is in the printed record that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] made the motion—and if it were not printed in the RECORD I would hesitate to tell you what the motion was—the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] made the motion that Mr. MCFADDEN, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, should not be heard by our committee. Thanks to the good sense of the committee that motion did not prevail.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. TREADWAY. I would add that the attitude I took before the Ways and Means Committee was absolutely justified by the action of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN]. I am glad I did it and would be glad to do it again.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. There you are. That is the way they do the job, and that is the reason I could not swallow this resolution. I made an honest effort to support this measure, but there was a time when, in the consideration of this resolution, I saw the cloak removed from some of the gentlemen who are so anxious to press this matter to a hasty conclusion, gentlemen on this side of the aisle. You say it is not political in one breath, but your acts—and I speak this respectfully—belie your words.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. TREADWAY. Does the gentleman consider that a statement on this floor, accusing the President of the United States of not being loyal to his oath of office, has any characteristics of political development?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I was not referring to that. That charge came from your side of the aisle. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. But absolutely discredited by this side of the aisle. [Applause.]

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. That would be no valid reason why that gentleman, the Representative of a Pennsylvania district, should not be permitted to appear before a committee to give evidence upon a subject to which he had given much study in the months and years he was serving your cause. Answer me that, please.

Mr. TREADWAY. I will be glad to make references to the matter in my own time a little later in the debate. I do not care to take the gentleman's time, because time is valuable, but if there is occasion to bring it up later I shall be glad to do it.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. House Joint Resolution 123, which was introduced into this Congress, is the administration measure, but that resolution is not the resolution which is being considered here to-day. We are considering House Joint Resolution 147, which is House Joint Resolution 123 with a very material amendment. I want you to understand what happened in connection with amending the original measure.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. PERKINS. I have no doubt of the gentleman's sincerity, but I would like to ask what was the question from which the banker sought to shield his client?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. He had answered the question once categorically; a second time, when it came in a little different way, he answered it evasively, and the third time he thought, in the vernacular, he had gotten his foot in it, and he declined to answer it. The question was this, whether or not, irrespective of the fact that either Great Britain or France had deposited funds with their fiscal agents, J. P. Morgan & Co., New York, for the payment of the December 15 amount—whether or not J. P. Morgan & Co. had such relations with England and France as that they would have paid this amount themselves upon notice from the countries to do it.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. PERKINS. Does not the gentleman think that was an entirely proper thing for a banker to refuse to answer, because it was a question whether or not a bank would extend credit to a foreign country?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I do not think so.

Mr. PERKINS. It did not involve relations between us and a foreign country.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I do not think it was a proper thing to permit him to refuse to answer the question as propounded. I do not consider it to be a privileged communication in the court room or before a committee of Congress. I recall that several years ago certain high crimes and misdemeanors were being investigated in another body. I recall that certain gentlemen refused to testify before that committee, and as I recall it the courts stepped in and said that it was the law of the land for such testimony to be given.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman kindly yield for one further question?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. PERKINS. As I understood the gentleman's response, it was not a question of information from a foreign country, it was a question of whether a banking concern would itself extend credit to a foreign country, which is not a matter before us at all. It is a private question for that banking institution.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. That question was not even before the committee.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I want to get back to the resolution that was introduced by request, through the hands of the chairman of this committee [Mr. COLLIER] and call your attention to the difference that obtains in respect of House Joint Resolution 147, which we are now considering, and the measure sponsored by the administration.

The resolution under discussion is similar to the bill as originally introduced by Mr. COLLIER by request of the Treasury Department except that a new paragraph is added to it. It is section 5 of the bill under discussion and was offered by the distinguished gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. RAGON].

In order that the full significance of this amendment may be seen, I would call the attention of the House to the condition which prevailed with reference to the settlement of governmental obligations at the close of the war. It will be remembered that this Government loaned billions of dollars to its allies during the war and subsequent thereto. The allied countries insisted and secured reparation agreements in which Germany was to pay certain damages growing out of the war. This country refused to take this position with reference to reparation. This Nation exacted no moneys from Germany growing out of said war except a small sum in part payment of the cost of the Army occupations.

The matter went along until the World War Debt Commission begun functioning. In the debt settlements, our allies insisted that their debts to us, incurred during the war and thereafter, be hooked up and dependent upon their collecting reparations from Germany. This Nation refused to proceed upon this theory and until this good hour, the intergovernmental debt owing to this country by the allied nations were in nowise dependent upon the collection of reparations. For the first time the policy of this Government has been changed toward considering Germany's capacity to pay, as affecting the liability of the nations mentioned in this agreement to pay their intergovernmental debts to us. In consequence of which we were departing upon a course which must have pleased the nations concerned, other than ourselves. For the first time, their obligations to us, which had been scaled down and reduced most generously in the debt settlement of the past—all of which I opposed—were suspended by us because of the alleged inability of Germany to pay the reparations to said countries.

The message of the President, recommending recreation of the World War Debt Commission could only be to renew the study of the capacity of the nations to pay. Its only purpose, in my opinion, was a step in the direction of a reduction or cancellation of the foreign debt.

Immediately after the President's message to the Congress had been delivered, Mr. Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury, on December 11, 1931, issued what was said to be, a clarifying statement. We include it in full:

MR. MELLON DEFINES NATION'S POSITION ON DEBT CANCELLATION

There should be no misinterpretation as to the administration's recommendations to Congress relating to the debts due us from foreign governments and the re-creation of the World War Foreign Debt Commission. The administration is opposed to cancellation. No recommendation made carries any such implication.

It is, however, the duty of those in authority to deal with realities, and there is no escaping the fact that some of our debtors can not meet in full the payments due us until there has been a substantial measure of economic recovery and that the position of others is so changed as to call for consideration of their present situation in the light of existing circumstances.

Our debt settlements were effected on the basis of the capacity of the debtors to pay. As the President said in his statement of June 20, "As the basis of the settlement of these debts was the capacity under normal conditions of the debtor to pay, we should be consistent with our own policies and principles if we take into account the abnormal situation now existing in the world."

Take the case of Great Britain, our best customer, which even in the depression year 1930 took $678,000,000 worth of American agricultural and industrial products. The economic and financial changes of the past year have immensely increased the payments of her payments to us. The series of events through which Great Britain was forced off the gold standard are too recent to require enumeration.

To-day the pound sterling is selling at $3.315 to the pound, which is a 32 per cent discount as compared with last year, when it stood at tariff parity or $4.866. All debts to Great Britain from foreign governments, except reparation payments, which are not being collected at all this year and are not likely to be collected in full next year, are payable in sterling. Her debt to us is payable in gold dollars. The combined effect of these unfavorable factors results in an enormously increased burden for the people of Great Britain.

Payments during the present fiscal year will serve to exemplify the magnitude of the additional burden.

With the pound sterling at par, the British Treasury needs 32,800,000 pounds in order to pay us $159,500,000. With the pound sterling at the rate at which it sold on December 10, 1931, it would take 48,100,000 pounds or an increase of 15,300,000 pounds, or 47 per cent. Or in other words, the burden on the British taxpayer is increased by almost one-half.

When the British debt settlement was made it was estimated that its present value at 4¼ per cent was 80 per cent of the total amount due prior to funding. If the amount to be raised in pound sterling to meet the obligation to us in dollars is increased by 47 per cent, it becomes apparent that from the standpoint of the British taxpayer he is asked to meet not the obligation as established by our Debt Commission but an amount considerably in excess of such obligation.

Nothing could more forcibly illustrate the changed situation which places on the executive as well as the legislative branch of Government the duty of reexamining the obligations of our debtors and their ability to meet them during a period of world-wide economic depression.

Does anyone believe that Austria or Hungary should be asked to pay the installments due from them in view of the extraordinarily straitened circumstances in which the people of those two countries find themselves and great difficulty which they experience in obtaining foreign exchange for the purpose of carrying on even the minimum of effectual commerce with the rest of the world?

Does anyone believe that Germany should be asked by the United States Government to meet her payments on the costs of the army of occupation when such a demand by us must be inevitably followed by demands of other creditors to pay her reparations in full?

These instances should suffice to demonstrate that to stand on the letter of our bond and to refuse to investigate or to consider the facts is to fail in our responsibility to the American people whom we represent and to the debtors whose capacity to pay we ourselves undertook to determine.

What intelligent business man or banker would blindly refuse to investigate or to consider the altered circumstances of a debtor whose unsecured obligation he held? The situation of our debtors has been immensely altered during the course of the last two years. New questions in relation to these debts are bound to arise in the course of the next few months. The Congress should be in a position through a commission created by it and composed in part of its own Members to ascertain what the facts actually are and to deal with these new problems as they arise.

It is with such thoughts as these in mind that the President recommended the re-creation of the World War Foreign Debt Commission. I am confident that upon mature consideration this recommendation will commend itself to the Congress.

It is well to recall that subsequent to the war, and particularly within the past few years, private bankers of this country have made extensive loans in Germany. If Germany is required to pay her treaty obligations, the collection of the private debts may be delayed or endangered. Further, there has been sold in this country through large banking institutions billions of dollars in German securities. These sales in the main have been made through the connections of the large New York Banks, and practically every community has owners of such securities. Their value has depreciated somewhat, and there may be delay or danger in their collection, with consequent injury to those selling or holding same for a profit.

It is very plain to see that it is to the interests of the private investments in Germany that the national obligations be reduced as much and as quickly as possible. In my judgment, the action hereunder, on June 20, 1931, was intended to be a forerunner of the re-creation of the World War Debt Commission, and its functioning to the end that the debts be further scaled down. Our foreign creditors would lose nothing if Germany's reparations to them were reduced, if at the same time we reduced their debts to us.

In my judgment, this resolution is merely the renewal of the effort to prefer the rights of the international bankers, the rights of the private creditors, over the obligations due this Government. And holding this view, there is nothing for me to do, except prefer to protect the governmental obligations.

After the message of the President to the Congress, seeking to recreate the World War Debt Commission, and after the statement of Mr. Mellon, tending to clarify the President's message, the liaison officers, particularly in the Treasury, ascertained that the temper of this Congress would not permit reduction or cancellation of the foreign debt. The leaders in the House and Senate refused point-blank to accept responsibility for the nonpayment of the sums due to us on December 15, which was decided in meetings held prior to the last-named date. Then we had repeated utterances that there was no intention of seeking debt reduction or debt cancellation. This is the situation that obtained when the resolution was taken up for consideration by the Ways and Means Committee in executive session on Thursday, December 17.

After the resolution (H. J. Res. 123) was read, the gentleman from Arkansas offered the amendment which declared the policy of Congress to be against the reduction or cancellation of any indebtedness of foreign countries to this Nation. Immediately gentlemen close to Mr. Hoover began objecting to it, and upon the vote taken it was adopted 16 to 9, only one gentleman of the administration party voting with the majority for this amendment. He was the gentleman from New York [Mr. CROWTHER]. Due to the fact that the press carried this information in detail with the names of those voting for and against it, I am not precluded from its discussion. Regardless of what may be said, the expressed attitude of these nine gentlemen was against this amendment.

While they, or their leaders, may say that we are not in favor of debt reduction or debt cancellation, when they, by their vote, would destroy the declaration of policy against debt reduction or cancellation, methinks, that while it may be the voice of Jacob, I can see and feel the hand of Esau.

Section 5 of the resolution under discussion reads as follows:

It is hereby expressly declared to be against the policy of Congress that any indebtedness of foreign countries to the United States should be in any manner canceled or reduced; and nothing in this joint resolution shall be construed as indicating a contrary policy, or as implying that favorable consideration will be given at any time, to a change in the policy hereby declared.

This amendment is a most splendid one. I voted for it in the committee and urged its passage. However, the House should not be deceived. The international bankers and those leading the fight for reduction or cancellation of the foreign debts at this hour, and before the vote is taken, are declaring that the Ragon amendment, being merely a declaration of policy of this Congress and not binding upon future Congresses, will not preclude their hopes from being realized. I do not subscribe to that theory. I believe that the consideration of this resolution, the Ragon amendment, and the focusing of the attention of Congress upon the private interests involved in debt reductions or cancellation will postpone for many a day the further loss of money to this Government from nonpayment of intergovernmental debts to us.

Another peculiar thing happened in the course of this hearing. I am just a small-town lawyer, but I have been active in the court room for 20 years. Information came to the chairman of the committee from the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN], the gentleman who occupied such high position with them for many, many years, that if Mr. Castle, the Under Secretary of State, were called before the committee certain information might be obtained from him that would be pertinent to the consideration of this question. The chairman of the committee requested Under Secretary Castle to appear before our committee. Mr. Castle has not reached the committee room yet. In his place we were honored, particularly honored, by the presence of the Secretary of State, who had already testified in the hearings. Of course, when you would ask Mr. Secretary of State what conversation occurred to which Mr. Castle was a party—the Secretary himself not present—the only answer he could give was that he had no knowledge of it. If you were trying a case in a justice of the peace court and you were to put a witness on the stand and ask him if a certain other person had a conversation with a third party, the witness not being present, there is no court in this land that would not sustain an objection to the question, or strike the answer, if one be given.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. CRISP. My friend has accurately stated what happened; but did not the Secretary of State enter the telephone booth, come back and say he had just talked to Mr. Castle over the phone, and that Mr. Castle said he had had no such conversation with the French ambassador?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The gentleman states it correctly; but I still say that in the primary fundamentals of the law of evidence it would still be hearsay.

Mr. CRISP. I admit it is hearsay, and a great deal of irrelevant and immaterial hearsay evidence was adduced at this hearing.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. But the fact remains that Mr. Castle did not testify before the committee. We had no opportunity to ask him about any conversation with M. Claudel, the French ambassador.

Now, in regard to the situation in which we find ourselves, we have a little pamphlet in which the testimony of Mr. Mills and the testimony of Mr. Stimson appears. They were to append certain documentary evidence to their verbal testimony, but not until around 11 o'clock to-day was this evidence available, and the evidence of other witnesses, including the statement of Mr. McFADDEN, of Mr. RANKIN, of Mr. PATMAN, of Mr. Horan, and of Mr. Davison, have not been made available to us even yet. The only way you can support this measure is to do it on faith. I started out trying to do this on faith and, finally, got to a point where I had to give up.

Referring to the documentary evidence, was it expected that the London protocol, the Franco-American agreement, the Wiggins report, could even be read intelligently within the time permitted?

There is another proposition involved here. A question was asked Mr. Mills with reference to the countries named in the resolution that did not receive reparations from Germany. I would like for you to get this. There are 16 nations named in this resolution. The testimony is that there are seven or eight of them that do not receive any money from Germany in the form of reparations.

When the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] was before the committee, I inquired of him the names of the seven or eight countries that did not receive any reparations from Germany, and he said he had the list some place. Some gentleman on the committee spoke up and said that Mr. Mills would put that in the record. When I picked up the hearings to-day containing Mr. Mills's testimony, I do not find the names of those seven or eight countries that received no reparations from Germany; in other words, seven or eight of these nations are receiving benefits without giving any consideration; seven or eight of these countries are receiving benefits from this country without sacrificing a thing in the way of forbearance of payments from Germany.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I will.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Has the gentleman stated what these countries are that receive no reparations from Germany?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I have not; and I take it that very few Members of this House have the information at hand. If anyone has and will give me the information, I will be very happy to have it.

Now, there are a number of things I want to call your attention to. In every debt settlement to which this Government is a party there is a provision for a 2-year moratorium by any signatory to the contract.

I want you to get that. When these debts were contracted by foreign countries there was a proviso inserted therein that if Germany's condition was such as to justify, it might have a moratorium for two years.

Now, Germany could not and did not show that she was incapacitated to pay. Certainly she was not entitled under the law to a moratorium under the contract, and certainly, if not under the contract, not by Executive action.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman asks for the eight countries that did not receive reparations from Germany. My study of the hearings in connection with conversations on the Young settlement——

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Oh, that is not competent testimony in a hearing of this kind. I can not yield for that. We have certain rules of evidence in the consideration of matters of this kind that preclude what would otherwise be considered competent evidence, or so it has been held in this case.

Mr. RAGON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. RAGON. The gentleman stated there was a provision in the contract that Germany might request a 2-year moratorium.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. RAGON. Did not that apply to the interest instead of the principal?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I do not know. I know that Italy did not pay any interest until after five years, and then she paid one-eighth of 1 per cent per annum, and my inquiry in the hearings shows that Italy will be excused from paying thirty-seven million plus in principal and the sum of $2,000,000 plus in interest.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman asked if there was anything in the record showing the names of the countries who had agreed to the moratorium and had no claim against the United States.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. No; against Germany. I know the gentleman has Mr. Stimson's statement, but I have not been able to find the names of the countries to which Germany does not pay the reparation.

Now, I want to come back to Germany's capacity to pay. If that is not in the picture, then Mr. Hoover has not a leg to stand on. You know you have a certain committee operating right now as a subcommittee of the Young plan in Switzerland. In the first column of the first page of the Washington Post I find that the Young plan committee finds that Berlin can pay the annuities.

Now, before this goes to a vote, I would have you know that you have a committee, operating under the Young plan, constituted for that purpose, reporting to the world that Germany is capable of making payment of the annuity.

In that same report I see that the Germans are good bookkeepers. It shows that in one instance they made a mistake in favor of themselves of $112,500,000. With reference to the Wiggan report, they made another error in dealing with the amount of short-time credit—a small error of $1,150,000,000.

We insert herewith, in full, this news item as it appeared in the Washington Post, December 17, 1931:

GERMANYS' PLEA FOR DEBT CUT GETS SETBACK—YOUNG PLAN COMMITTEE FINDS BERLIN CAN PAY ANNUITIES—BASEL BODY CHARGES INTEREST IS INFLATED—EXPERTS ALSO SAY REPUBLIC HOLDS LARGER INVESTMENTS THAN REPORTED

BASEL, SWITZERLAND, December 16.—Germany's plea for reduction in reparations received several severe setbacks to-day.

A subcommittee of the Young plan advisory commission discovered, it was understood, that Germany's foreign trade balance should be more than sufficient to pay unconditional reparations annuities of about $150,000,000.

The subcommittee, which tried for a week to establish the net indebtedness of the Reich, turned in a report which was withheld from the public but will be incorporated in the final findings of the investigators.

The reference to the foreign trade excess was understood to have been included in the report at the request of the French, who wished to combat arguments that Germany was unable to pay the nonpostponable annuities considered inviolable by the Paris government.

DEBT INTEREST UNDERESTIMATED

The subcommittee found, it was learned, that the total interest on debts which Germany must meet annually is $112,500,000 less than the total submitted last week by Carl Melchior, Berlin's member of the Young plan committee.

Doctor Melchior's figure was $450,000,000, but according to a reliable source the subcommittee reported the proper total to be $337,500,000.

The subcommittee, composed of statisticians under the chairmanship of Maurice Frere, of Belgium, also was understood to have concluded that Germany's short-term indebtedness was nearer the $1,850,000,000 set forth in the report of the committee headed by Albert H. Wiggin than $3,000,000,000, as asserted by Germany before the Young plan experts last week.

The statisticians found, it was said, a number of debts which they were unwilling to recognize as "short-term."

OUTSIDE INVESTMENTS HELD LARGER

The subcommittee refused to set a figure for German investments abroad but declared them to be much higher than the $2,125,000,000 set forth in the Wiggin report. This total was estimated July 31.

Sir Walter Layton, British delegate, began writing the final report to-night. He, Prof. Charles Rist, of France, and Doctor Melchior have deserted the Bank for International Settlements to carry on their work at the Englishman's Hotel.

The World Bank board meeting set for January 11, 1932, may be advanced a week. The board must pass on the experts' recommendations before the various governments consider them.

In the same paper on the same page, adjoining that column, we find that the German Reich boosted the budget by a billion dollars annually during the period between 1926 and 1929. If they were able to increase the salaries of their officials by $375,000,000 and to make the payment of $250,000,000 for unemployment insurance, $125,000,000 for reparations, and for various sums the amount of $175,000,000, making a billion dollars in all, it seems to me that that bolsters up the finding of this committee that Germany had the capacity to pay.

We insert herewith the news item above referred to, which appeared on the first page of the Washington Post, December 17, 1931:

REICH BOOSTED BUDGET BY BILLION, DATA SHOW—ABOUT $375,000,000 WAS ADDED TO PAY OF PUBLIC SERVANTS BETWEEN 1926 AND 1929, YOUNG PLAN COMMITTEE REVEALS

BASEL, SWITZERLAND, December 17.—Germany's budgetry expenses increased $925,000,000 between 1926 and 1929, the Young plan advisory committee on reparations reported to-night. About $375,000,000 of this amount resulted from increases in the salaries of public servants granted in 1927, the experts found.

The statistics were contained in a report of the subcommittee on German budgetary practices, parts of which were made public by the financial experts who are investigating Germany's capacity to pay reparations. The report, a communique said, was widely commented on at to-night's plenary session of the Young plan committee.

The salary increase brought the pay of lesser functionaries to the level of 1913, the communique explained. Other items contributing to the increase in budgetary expenses included unemployment insurance of $250,000,000; reparations, $125,000,000; and various, $175,000,000.

The communique revealed that the financial relationship between the Reich and Federal States was discussed by the subcommittee as well as recent measures increasing the sums the Federal States received from the central Government.

The subcommittee, headed by Hendryk Colijn, of Holland, also went into the cost of education and the practice of subsidizing housing enterprises from public funds. In addition, the investigators inquired into the growth of public debts in general.

Germany's recent attempts to balance the budget by drastic economies were lauded in the report. The experts agreed that Germany was right in attaching importance to providing without delay for the reduction of floating debt caused by past budgetary deficits, despite the heavy burden this imposes during the period of crisis. The communique confirmed previous reports that another subcommittee, headed by Maurice Frere, of Belgium, had fouhd it impossible to determine the exact total of German holdings abroad.

"The subcommittee refrained," the statement said, "from setting the total of holdings abroad, but indicated that $2,100,000,000, as of July 31, 1931, was a reasonable figure.

"But this takes no account of the considerable foreign holdings resulting from the flight of capital, for which it is impossible to set a figure."

PARIS, December 17 (U. P.).—The French and British Governments brought the most vital point of the international-debts controversy to a head to-night when Sir Frederick Leith-Ross, British deputy controller of finance, arrived for informal discussion of conflicting viewpoints.

Earlier a British memorandum had been received at the foreign office emphasizing the London Government's contention that private debts owed by Germany must be given priority over political debts (reparations) which the Reich is pledged to pay.

France, which has little at stake in German private debts as compared to the huge sums invested by British and United States bankers, insists that reparations must be given first claim. It is generally conceded that Germany can not pay both, and it remains to be decided whether she can pay the total of either reparations or private debts.

The British note, which was a reply to a recent French memorandum on reparations, was not made public, but it was made known that it said details of the projected January debts conference can not be settled until the Young plan advisory committee at Basel reports on Germany's capacity to pay. The British Government made no specific answer to points raised in the French communication.

One of the most difficult problems admittedly will concern participation of the United States in the international conference, and Leith-Ross is expected to discuss that question thoroughly with the French Government leaders. They will go into the problem of framing an agenda which will obtain official participation by the American Government.

I want the Congress to get this picture. There are 16 foreign nations whose debts are to be postponed if this resolution is enacted into law. There is not a syllable of evidence that any of these nations sought the moratorium agreement, or that they, or any of them, were unable to pay the full amount due this country upon the due date without any ill consequences to it. I repeat, there is not a word in this record that intimates that any of these foreign nations were not ready, willing, and able to make the payments involved herein.

A very startling disclosure may be witnessed if we consider the amount of money that these 16 nations expended in the last fiscal year for armament and war preparation. The sum total of their expenditures for this purpose is $1,986,799,625—in round numbers, $2,000,000,000. We get this information from the World Peace Foundation compiled by them from the forthcoming League of Nations Armaments Yearbook.

We quote from the New York Times dated Sunday, August 2, 1931:

What nations spend on arms

Austria	$14,507,320
Belgium	33,303,200
Czechoslovakia	51,189,000
Estonia	5,520,000
Finland	16,457,500
France	466,960,000
Germany	171,923,040
British Empire	726,731,065
Greece	21,340,800
Hungary	20,200,000
Italy	248,946,500
Latvia	7,860,000
Lithuania	5,680,000
Poland	92,072,000
Rumania	53,647,200
Yugoslavia	50,458,000
Total	1,986,799,625

It is very interesting to know that the sums expended within this one year by the British Empire, France, and Italy on arms total the startling sum of $1,424,637,565—in round numbers, one billion and a half dollars.

The deferred payments amount to $252,566,803. This amount is made up as follows:

Amounts payable during the fiscal year 1932 by foreign governments on account of their indebtedness

Country	Principal	Interest	Total
Austria	$287,556		$287,556
Belgium	4,200,000	$3,750,000	7,950,000
Czechoslovakia	3,000,000		3,000,000
Estonia	108,012	492,360	600,372
Finland	55,000	257,295	312,295
France	11,363,500	38,636,500	50,000,000
Great Britain	28,000,000	131,520,000	159,520,000
Greece	660,000	449,080	1,109,080
Hungary	12,270	57,072	69,342
Italy	12,200,000	2,506,125	14,706,125
Latvia	44,664	205,989	250,653
Lithuania	38,615	185,930	224,545
Poland	1,325,000	6,161,835	7,486,835
Rumania	800,000		800,000
Yugoslavia	250,000		250,000
Total	62,344,617	184,222,186	246,566,803
Germany, army costs	6,000,000		6,000,000
Total	68,344,617	184,222,186	252,566,803

Thus it is patented that England, France, and Italy would pay $224,000,000 plus of the $252,000,000 deferred. I would repeat again that these three nations, England, France, and Italy, for the past fiscal year have expended in round numbers a billion and a half dollars for arms and war preparations. In other words, these three nations, within the past fiscal year, have expended six times the amount of money involved herein, as a deferred payment to them. This condition obtains, and the deferred payments will be brought about, even though these nations make no request therefor, and everyone admits there is no evidence in the record to show that they do not have the capacity to pay without hurting them.

Mr. GARBER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. GARBER. What did the evidence develop as to the amount of reparations deferment extended to Germany?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Approximately $400,000,000. In other words, the Treasury says $400,000,000 as an annuity going to other countries other than the United States.

But, my friends, this statement of the President of June 20 is not the agreement under consideration in this Congress, and there can not be any mistake about that. The President of the United States on June 20, 1931, said there will be a moratorium for a period of one year of all intergovernmental debts. There are two main distinctions. In the first place, the postponement has not been for one year. The postponement is spread out over a period of 10 years. Ogden Mills testified before our committee—and that is in the hearing—that the President had in mind stepping up the payments as you would shove a ladder up. In other words, he would defer the payment of 1932 until the time for the payment of the 1933 amount, and then let the payment be made in 1933 for the amount due in 1932, and so on; but that did not suit France. France would not sign that sort of an agreement. Then we determined we wanted a long period over which to stretch the payment of the amount deferred—25 years I believe. France said, "We have to have it paid in three years." Then France said six years, and finally they agreed on 10 years. And instead of a postponement for one year the postponement is for a period, in part, of 10 years. Has anybody thought about that?

Mr. GARBER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. GARBER. The moratorium referred to in the Versailles treaty was for a period of two years. Does that include the nonpostponable debts of France?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I could not say; but I can say this: The President's proposal was to postpone the payment of all intergovernmental debts. Just go back to your primary Latin days and think of what intergovernmental debts are. What does that mean? That means all debts between the governments. This resolution on which you are called to vote to-day does not provide for postponement of all intergovernmental debts. France would not agree to that, and when they came to write that agreement France made them write into it that all the money that she would receive as a result of the Versailles treaty as unconditional reparations must be paid to France, and France receives this fiscal year $125,000,000 from Germany as a result of her stand and as a result of the departure from the Hoover plan.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. PERKINS. Would the gentleman be good enough to explain to the House what the purpose of section 3 is? It would seem to the ordinary reader—and some of us have no knowledge on this subject—that this agreement to postpone can only depend upon agreements by other countries to postpone.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. That is correct, but France accepted unconditional reparations. There is no question on earth about it. You can see in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury for 1931, page 361, the text of the agreement reached by the American and French negotiators at Paris, France, July 6, 1931. There, the second thing France says is:

> However, the Reich will pay the amount of the unconditional annuity.

And the Treasury tells me that amount is $125,000,000 for this year, and I say to you that such contract is a preference given France that was not thought of when the President issued his statement on June 20, 1931.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But the gentleman understands, of course, that France did that in order to save the identity of the preferential payments, and that the International Bank for Foreign Credits will immediately reloan that back to Germany.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Where; to Germany?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. She will take German bonds for it.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. It goes to the German railroads, and railroad bonds are issued for the money received by the railroad.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But they are state railroads.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. It is like another thing that occurred in the committee. Testimony was given in the committee, and there is no contradiction of it, that there was a private loan to private bankers in Germany to the amount of $600,000,000 to $800,000,000, and that the same money was reloaned to Russia at a higher rate of interest.

Now, we can not fool ourselves. I do not think the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] is fooling himself. This is a fight between private bankers and the Government of the United States to determine whether or not their private debts are going to be preferred over our governmental obligations.

Mr. SIROVICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. SIROVICH. The gentleman stated before that in the event Germany was unable to pay her obligations the contract provided that she was to be given a two years' moratorium. Am I right?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. That is my understanding of it; yes, sir.

Mr. SIROVICH. Does that contract provide further that in the event of Germany's inability to pay she must ask for a moratorium herself, or that it must be instituted by the debtor, to ask the creditor?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. As I understand it, Germany would initiate the conference. The reference of the gentleman from New York, as I understand it, is to the moratorium under the Young plan.

Mr. SIROVICH. Did Germany initiate the conference here?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I could not answer that. I take it in view of the fact that this Young plan committee is working on it, she did, but I could not give the gentleman a positive answer in that connection. But, assume that we had a private business transaction and one of you gentlemen were president of a bank, and we Congressmen owed you money. Did you ever hear of the president of a bank or a chairman of a board of directors initiating a proposal to extend credit to a debtor? I venture the assertion that in this hour of stress, if any bank presidents started anything like that they would soon be out of a job.

About Thursday, December 10, I believe it was, a man in high place rose in the House of Commons and he had a few remarks to make about the ability of England to pay. I do not believe he mentioned anything about the ability to pay, as far as this editorial is concerned, but Mr. Chamberlain, Chanchellor of the Exchequer, assured the House of Commons on Thursday, December 10, that all British foreign obligations could and would be met.

That statement was made the day before Mr. Mellon's clarifying statement heretofore referred to was uttered. It related to the re-creation of the World War Debt Commission. Oh, they want to get away from that World War Debt Commission and the re-creation of it, but the President recommended its re-creation. Mr. Mellon, as we have seen, sought to explain the need of its re-creation. In that article you see in his mind the financial master that he was supposed to be—the gentleman sometimes referred to as "the man who stayed too long"—that it was his intention and his understanding of the President's intention that this commission was to be re-created in order that a survey might be made of the capacity of our foreign debtors to pay. What does that mean? It means an effort to scale down, reduce, or cancel these debts. America will not stand for that sort of legislation. My good friend COLLIER in a flight of eloquence stated that "there were small ways to do things, and there were big ways; and that he chose the big way." I agree with Mr. COLLIER—there are two ways to this thing. In my judgment, there are two ways—the European way and the American way. For my part, I take the American way. [Applause.]

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 additional minutes.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. CELLER. In the event we do not pass this resolution granting the moratorium, what would be the gentleman's opinion as to the effect on our foreign debtors and on the world in general?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. That information was sought and, as far as I can find in the hearings, no answer was given.

Mr. CELLER. What would the gentleman say?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. This statement was given to the press on June 20, 1931. It was afterwards ratified July 6, 1931. The first payment to be made was December 15, 1931. That day has come and gone. What has happened as far as the effect of the nonpayment on the 15th is concerned that would not have happened otherwise?

Mr. GREEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. GREEN. I wonder if the gentleman has any information as to whether or not, if this moratorium is adopted, America will probably go off the gold standard? Was that brought out in the committee? That has been predicted by some Members.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I wish to say to the gentleman from Florida that the hearings are silent on that score.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I understood the gentleman to say, and I understand the agreement to be under the Young plan, that any nation that shows inability to pay has the right to apply to the proper commission or agency set up to make that showing, and they will be allowed a 1-year or a 2-year moratorium.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. A 2-year moratorium.

Mr. GREENWOOD. If that would be the case, then Germany could apply to another nation and receive that, but under this plan it is a blanket proposal that takes in all the nations, regardless of their ability or their inability to pay, and therefore covers a wider field than was intended to be covered by the agreement under the Young plan?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Did the committee have any assurance from the Treasury Department or from the President that there would be any let-up on the debtors of the United States from banks and various institutions that are foreclosing people all over the country? Did you have any assurance that we were going to get any relief for our own people from anybody connected with the Treasury Department or with the executive branch of the Government?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I did not hear any such statements coming from either Mr. Mills or Mr. Stimson or any other witness.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I yield to my good friend from Ohio.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman is making a splendid presentation. He mentioned a moment ago the amount that Germany had loaned to Russia. Has the gentleman any figures that will show how much of the money that has been borrowed from Germany has been used in the way of making internal improvements?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. No. I asked the question as to the amount of American capital invested in Germany as of June 20, 1931. The answer was that as of December 30, 1930, there was about $1,400,000,000, plus, as I recall it. Other statements indicate $3,000,000,000. That was the nearest we got to that point.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Was there any testimony before your committee as to whether the nations concerned had or had not limited their expenditures for armaments because of the moratorium being extended?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. There is not a single word that any benefit came to them such as the gentleman suggests.

Mr. YON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. YON. Was there any evidence given to your committee during the consideration of this resolution as to the amount of American capital now owing by the nations mentioned in this resolution—the total amount loaned by the international bankers?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I do not recall it. I want to call the attention of the committee to this point: Mention is made of the suffering in Germany and in the European countries. We never had any particular testimony on that point. When we settled with France, France got the best of the bargain, and I read in a speech this morning made in another body, where a gentleman considered close to the administration made the statement that at this time the capacity of France to pay exceeded America's capacity to cancel.

Can you forget for a moment that in the fiscal year that ended July 1, this year, this Government is in red ink approximately $1,000,000,000, and on December 15, 1931, in the present fiscal year, with six and one-half months yet to go, according to the statement of the Treasury, we are already $1,500,000,000 plus in red ink?

The deficit this year is going to be $2,000,000,000 or more. It comes back to this question, as I view it: I say to you that if I felt that any hurt was going to come to this country, and I might even go further and say if any serious hurt would come to Germany because of this resolution failing, I might throttle my inclinations. But there has been no proof before our committee to that effect. It comes to this point, whether the $252,000,000 deferred payments contained in this resolution shall be paid by these 16 nations, or fall upon the already too heavily laden shoulders of the American taxpayers. [Applause.]

Mr. GARBER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. GARBER. The gentleman has presented a very able exposition of the question involved, but I want to inquire upon whom is the burden of proof, and how should that proof appear to the members of this committee? In the absence of any evidence whatever to the membership of this committee, why the forcing of a serious international question like this before this body?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Is the gentleman a lawyer?

Mr. GARBER. No; I am not a lawyer.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Well, I will gladly set forth my view. This House joint resolution was referred to a committee. The proponents of the measure certainly had the burden of proof; they took the burden of proof; they introduced their witnesses, and when they closed their evidence, as far as I am concerned, they did not make out a case. [Applause.]

Just before I came to the floor of this House to-day I was reading one of the best weekly newspapers published in Kentucky. It was the Cynthiana Democrat, published at Cynthiana, Ky.—this week's issue. It set forth in cryptic language its viewpoint with respect to this moratorium, and as it is short, I will read it to you.

Mr. Hoover does not believe charity begins at home. Kentucky warehouses are filled with tobacco, on which the Government holds mortgages, and drastic efforts are made to collect them, yet the President makes almost a sobbing appeal to extend the war-debt holiday to relieve foreign debtors.

My friend, I do not deem it necessary to attempt a word picture of the distressed conditions of our own people. Governmental statistics show that the decline in the valuation of the farmers' crops for the past two years has been 49 per cent. Thousands of farmers have lost their homesteads under the cold hammer of the foreclosure proceedings. Thousands of banks have failed in our home land. Billions of dollars in property value have vanished in our own midst as by magic. Seven million unemployed Americans cry out for work; tens of thousands upon tens of thousands cry out for bread. Charity does begin at home. It may not be the international viewpoint, but I believe it is the viewpoint of the people in 19 Kentucky counties, whom I have the honor to represent, when I say upon this floor that America should be just to her own before she is generous to a foreign people.

I want to say in conclusion that while I have been earnest I do not mean to impugn the motives of any Member of the Congress in their position. I do not possess any illusions as to the result of this debate or the result of the vote, but as a Member of Congress and as a member of this Committee on Ways and Means, I felt it was upon me to bring the limited information I had to the House. I thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. EATON].

Mr. EATON of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, I wish first of all to express as one Member of this House my appreciation of the distinguished chairman of this committee [Mr. COLLIER] for the lofty, broad-visioned, and patriotic point of view he brought to us in his speech. I am going to vote for this moratorium. I am opposed to any proposal at this time for the cancellation of debts, although I am confident that in the not distant future we shall have to face that problem because of the economic exhaustion of certain debtor countries and because of the inequalities resting upon the different peoples of the world in connection with intergovernmental debts. For instance, I am reliably informed that Great Britain has agreed to pay the United States on the basis of 4½ per cent, 81 per cent of her indebtedness; the French who, in my judgment, are as able to pay as any nation in the world, have agreed to pay on the basis of 50 per cent; while the Italians come in on the basis of 26 per cent.

I am not wildly enthusiastic about this moratorium on the ground that it is going to usher in the kingdom of Heaven and settle all our world problems. But I am profoundly interested in it, because I believe we have got to keep faith with our Government and with the world by putting this legislation through, because it will give our people and the other nations affected a brief breathing spell and because this discussion will open the way for the much-needed education of our people, our Congress, our Government, and the rest of the world as to the nature and meaning of the baffling problems that now face mankind.

If you will permit me, I would like, in the few minutes that are allotted to me, to give an interpretation necessarily inadequate, using this moratorium as a symbol, of the challenge which confronts civilization in this and every other country to-day.

You will, I believe, agree with me that mankind is a spiritual entity, and that the history of civilization is in essence a history of the development of the spirit of man. Occasionally down through the centuries the forms that the spiritual energies of man have taken on, used, and outgrown are broken up by some unusual circumstance and a new era is introduced. Such marked the beginning of the Christian era; such was the beginning of the era that followed the Dark Ages, when out of the Renaissance and the Reformation were born those tremendous energies that created the American Nation and made possible the progress of the modern centuries throughout the world.

To-day, mankind stands in the shadow of the greatest crisis of all recorded history, with the possible exception of the beginning of the Christian era. It is impossible for any man who loves his fellows, or has respect for his duties to God and man, to face these tragic conditions in a partisan, a sectarian, or a sectional spirit.

In this faith I venture to express my view of the responsibility that rests upon this House, upon the Executive, and upon every American-minded citizen of our beloved country.

In the first place, gentlemen, I believe that in the stress and anguish of this hour a new era is being born, in which the masses of men in every country are going at last to have access to the economic resources of the world which will lift them out of poverty, out of dependence, out of unemployment, and out of fear. We are groping now in the darkness before the dawn of the greatest era of peace, prosperity, and happiness for the masses of men the world has ever known. Strange as it may seem, as we gird our mind to face the new age we find the world bogged down with debts. Nations are in debt, minor political units are in debt, corporations and individuals are in debt.

Do you gentlemen realize that beginning with the World War and ending with the loans that were made since, we have taken out of this country and blown away in battle or transferred to European countries nearly $40,000,000,000, and every dollar of that money was produced by somebody's sweat and somebody's brain power? If we had that $40,000,000,000 back in this country now we would not have unemployment, we would not have lack of credit, we would not have homes foreclosed on account of inability to pay. In making this enormous transfer of our funds we have simply shut our eyes and jumped into the bog with the rest of the world.

As we stand at the threshold of this new age, with its supreme tasks, with its new and baffling problems, we must face the fact that the world is sick. We are a part of it all. We never again can escape from world contact and the responsibilities of world leadership. We are going to sink or swim with the other nations. We are like the old lady down in Maine who got up in prayer meeting and said, "Thank the Lord our church is united—we are all froze together." That is where we are to-day, whether we like it or not. We are in with the Germans, we are in with all the peoples of Europe, and they are in with us, and from now on we sink or swim together.

Now, let me point out two or three things that we Americans have at stake.

I agree with the gentleman who has just spoken—that we have got to decide whether under these conditions we can retain our American principles of life and American principles of government. I believe we can. I do not believe we can do it, however, by any narrow partisanship, by any sectionalism, by any class consciousness, by any elevation of the inconsequential, by any blind and bigoted denial of the great central problems of our time. For once in our lives we have come together—North, South, East, and West—and whether we elect a Republican or a Democrat as President next year, we have got to stand together as a nation, 120,000,000 of us, if we are to save what God has given us in our form of government and in the principles that constitute the essence of our American civilization and that govern our daily lives.

In the second place, we have at stake the principles that control the economy of our life, and upon which have been builded our economic and industrial structure.

I have been associated for 20 years with the great industries of this Nation. The task assigned me was to increase the share of the employees in the products of their toil, and I based my service on the proposition that the chief instrumentality of civilization in America is organized industry, which, of course, includes the farm. That is where the final battle is being fought out. We have to-day millions of unemployed; not due to the Republicans, not due to the Democrats, but due to the play of great, eternal, economic energies that we have been fooling with and have known nothing of. The tragedy of unbalanced production and consumption, of unnecessary unemployment and financial failure, is forcing us to a new study of these laws and energies, which will bring us after a while into a saner and sounder form of life.

Gentlemen, this moratorium is just a symbol. It reveals to the Members of the House responsibilities that we have never known before. And it lifts our deliberations out of the muck of demagoguery and partisanship. The other day we heard a distinguished gentleman on the majority side make the statement that Mr. Hoover proposed to spend millions for the railroads, millions for the banks, and nothing for starving Americans. That kind of talk constitutes the acme of partisan futility.

Take the New York Central Railroad, one of the greatest and best-managed transportation systems in the country. For 60 years it never passed a dividend until last week. Five years ago its stock was selling at $250. At the beginning of this year it sold at $132, and yesterday it sold at $24. Thousands of its employees are out of work. Much of its rolling stock stands idle. Why? Because there is not enough freight and passenger business to pay the running expenses of the system. If President Hoover can do something to rehabilitate the railroads, I ask you if that will not be the best way to get employment for starving people?

Take the banks. They are receiving deposits, doing all kinds of business except making loans, and at the same time their capital is being steadily impaired by the depreciation in the market value of their bonds. Surely, if we can do something to bring back the value of bank securities and keep the banks from being closed, that will help the unemployed and relieve hungry and homeless women and children.

Now, I want to say a word with reference to our honored President. Mr. Hoover was placed in the White House by the intelligent choice of a vast majority of our American people. He may not be a great showman. But in my judgment he is the best-equipped man in America for the tragic testings and burdens of that high office at this time. His extraordinary opulence of mind is matched by a sympathetic understanding of the needs of humanity. He is steering our ship of state through the most terrific tempest in history. He is forced to steer by stars obscured by the storm clouds that enwrap the world. Most of us can not see the stars at all. We see only the clouds. But Herbert Hoover is safeguarding the priceless heritage of American ideals and principles intrusted to his care, and when he retires from office he will be able to say, "I have kept America American." It is our duty, regardless of party, sect, section, or breed, to stand behind our President in his sacrificial service of his own people and of mankind. [Applause.]

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WIGGLESWORTH].

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, discussion of various questions within the general field of intergovernmental indebtedness is helpful to a better understanding of the problem presented by this indebtedness which to-day commands the attention of the world. The discussion should not, however, obscure the particular question upon which the House is called to pass in the resolution which is now before us.

The question presented by the resolution is, in my judgment, a very simple one. It is simply the ratification or nonratification of the proposal of June 22 last, the proposal by the President of the United States, subject to confirmation by Congress, to postpone all payments upon debts of foreign governments to the American Government during the present fiscal year in the event of like postponement for one year of all payments on intergovernmental debts owing to other important creditor powers. This is the only question which is before us at this time. No other question is involved. Any other question which may arise in the future can be dealt with if and when it arises.

I have been interested in intergovernmental indebtedness during the past 10 years. It was my privilege to serve for two years with the World War Foreign Debt Commission and for four years with the agent general for reparation payments under the Dawes plan. During the summer I have revisited Germany, Switzerland, England, and France with a view to further study of the subject.

As far as I am concerned, I favored ratification of the President's proposal at the time that it was made. I am in favor of its ratification now.

Intergovernmental debts to-day are evidenced by obligations issued under a series of agreements, in some cases concluded after years of experiment and negotiation. They include obligations issued under the agreements for refunding debts due America, representing advances under the Liberty loan acts, sales of surplus war material, and relief extended to some 17 different nations, originally amounting to some $11,000,000,000. They include obligations issued under similar agreements in respect to vast sums owed other creditor powers. They include obligations issued under the terms of the Young plan for the settlement of reparation indebtedness affecting directly no less than 12 different nations, with a total population of over 450,000,000. These and other agreements of lesser importance define the periodical payments to and by the principal powers of the world based in each instance on estimated capacity to pay in the satisfaction of existing intergovernmental indebtedness.

The proposal of the President, except as required by the year's postponement, involves, in my judgment, no change in any of these agreements. It contemplates no change in the settlements concluded in respect to debts due this Government or any other government. It looks to no change in the terms of the Young plan for the settlement of reparation indebtedness. It merely calls for a moratorium expiring June 30 next in respect to all payments on intergovernmental indebtedness, urging that all concerned be not only "good neighbors" but "wise creditors" as well. In so far as America is concerned, the sums postponed under the terms of the pending resolution will be repayable in full in 10 annual installments with interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum.

I am sure that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON] does not mean to leave a false impression with the House. If I understood him correctly, he indicated that France had refused to concur in the proposal now under consideration and that she had insisted that she receive considerable payments from Germany on reparation account during the period of postponement. Under the terms of the Young plan Germany is required to pay annually some four hundred millions of dollars. Of this total some one hundred and fifty millions are payable unconditionally, the balance being subject to postponement by Germany under specified conditions. France agreed unqualifiedly to the postponement of her share in the conditional portion of the annuity. All that she asked was that her share in the unconditional portion should be paid by Germany to the Bank for International Settlements, which in turn might relend it in full and immediately within Germany. She asked this in order to preserve the framework of the Young plan. She receives nothing on reparation account during the period of postponement.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I should be glad to yield, but I have very little time.

Mr. GARBER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one question for information?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I shall be glad to yield for one question, but my time is very limited.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. GARBER. Did the gentleman mean to be understood as saying that France obtained nothing, or that Germany was required to pay her nonpostponable debt into the Bank for International Settlements, which would, in turn, loan it back to Germany?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. The unconditional payments are made to the bank and reloaned within Germany immediately.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I can not yield further. The forces which led to the proposal should need no emphasis. An economic storm of the first magnitude has swept throughout the world. No nation has escaped its effects. Almost every nation has suffered severely. In agriculture, in industry, in trade, in widespread unemployment, in conditions of credit and currency, in budgetary deficits, in political unrest, in revolution, in these and other ways, the effects of the storm have been manifest. Threatened disaster in Central Europe, the downfall of the British Labor Government, the suspension of gold payments in Great Britain, the drain of gold from the United States to the extent of some seven hundred millions of dollars, all within a period of about five months, bear witness to the storm's violence.

In Central Europe, crisis became apparent in May. It became apparent with the discovery that the so-called Kredit Anstalt, an institution handling a very large proportion of Austria's banking business, had become involved in serious financial difficulty. Action by the Austrian Parliament, aid from the Bank for International Settlements, at Basel, aid from some ten of the leading central banks of the world, failed to localize the trouble. Within a month it had spread to Germany, with such consequences as to threaten the entire fabric of European finance. Confidence was shaken. A run on Germany began. Short-term credit, the very life blood of German industry and German foreign trade, was withdrawn from Germany to an alarming extent. Figures for the end of June showed a loss in short-term credit as compared with January 1, equivalent to some eight hundred millions of dollars. The reserves of the Reichsbank were driven almost to the legal minimum. Financial collapse within Germany, in the judgment of those in a position to know, appeared almost inevitable within a matter of hours. Immediate action was called for, if disastrous consequences were to be avoided.

The proposal by the President followed, with instantaneous effect throughout the world. Collapse was forestalled.

It is difficult to exaggerate the gravity of the situation which might have developed had the hand of hope not been extended at this time. No one who followed developments in Europe closely prior to the President's proposal could fail to appreciate the menace of disaster. No one, in my judgment, who has followed developments carefully since that time can fail to realize the tremendous responsibility which the President would have assumed if he had failed to act at the critical hour. I have not time to paint the picture in detail. It is sufficient to say that financial breakdown, economic breakdown, political chaos, knocked at the doors of Germany and other nations of central Europe, and that they would have had incalculable consequences in the world as a whole.

The economic frontiers of America have been flung far beyond the political boundaries of the Nation. Aside from the billions of dollars owed us by the several governments of Europe, aside from the billions of dollars which we have invested in Europe, we have in Europe to-day the outstanding market for American products. Sales to Europe even last year—a year of profound depression—amounted to almost $2,000,000,000. Sales to Europe over a period of years have almost equaled in value the total sales by America to all the rest of the world put together. America has a tremendous interest in the well-being of Europe. That interest, the interest in the preservation of present-day civilization as well, in my judgment, fully justified the moratorium proposed by the President and call for its ratification at this time.

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I shall be glad to yield at the end of my statement. I can not yield now.

The proposal was made to meet the disaster which threatened in Germany. It was made to give the period of a year to the economic recovery of the world. It was made to contribute to the forces of recuperation, both at home and abroad. To refuse to ratify it now would be to withdraw the hand extended in time of need. To refuse to ratify it now would be to extinguish the hope that it kindled, with all that that hope meant to the world. To refuse to ratify it now, as our distinguished colleague from Texas, Judge SUMNERS, has expressed it, "might affect the financial situation of the entire world."

There is nothing, Mr. Chairman, in my judgment, either mysterious or complicated in the moratorium proposal. It does not suggest cancellation. It does not suggest reduction. As amended in committee it expressly precludes both possibilities. It merely suggests deferred collection. It merely suggests that we accord to our debtor nations in Europe the same consideration that any one of us might accord to individual debtors in difficult times.

I hope sincerely that the House will lose no time in giving the proposal its approval. [Applause.]

I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP].

Mr. CRISP. My colleagues, I am as intensely pro-American as any Member of this House. I am a party man, but I always place country above party. [Applause.] In this instance there is no conflict whatever between my party and my country, for this is an American question and not a political question.

In the time I have I can not discuss this matter as closely as I would like to discuss it, but I think there have been straw men, extraneous matter, irrelevant matter, matters that have nothing to do with the issues, injected into this case in an effort to becloud the issue and fool the people. I say that with respect. Let me say I have always been tolerant of those differing with me. They have just as much right to their opinions as I have to mine, and I accord to them the utmost sincerity of purpose.

To my mind it would be, under existing conditions, calamitous to the world and to America if this resolution did not pass. [Applause.]

Gentlemen, I do not want any applause. It takes time, and I ask you to desist from applause. I never speak for applause.

I agree thoroughly with the position that my friend the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary announced in a speech in the House last week, that the President did not pursue the wise course in handling this matter. I think the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] correctly defined the power of the President, and that the President, of course, has no right to change the law. He has a right to negotiate treaties and subject to the approval of the Senate a law can be changed, but I know the President acted in utmost good faith, with the purest of motives, with a desire to serve the world. I think, however, it would have been better, after he had made his suggestion of a moratorium, which he made subject to ratification by Congress, had he called Congress into session to pass upon it. But he did not.

The President did me, among others, the courtesy of conferring with me by telephone at my home in Georgia before the moratorium was suggested, and advised me of the conditions in Austria, in Germany, and in Europe, and after being apprised by the President of the United States as to conditions there, I stated if his proposition did not involve or did not commit me to supporting legislation canceling or scaling down the American war debts or making their payment dependent upon the payment of German reparations to the Allies, I would support a one year's moratorium, and I am going to support the moratorium. I thought it wise then, and that conviction has been confirmed by the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee.

I have nothing to say as to how any of my colleagues should act, who responded to the President's telegram on this subject. They are alone the keepers of their own consciences and must decide what is best for them to do, and whatever they do I know they are acting in good faith.

My friends, I am not going to attempt to go over all the details of the economic situation, for I can not do it and say what I desire to say, but, briefly, the Bank of Austria was to close, the Government overthrown. Six hundred million dollars in gold in a few days were drawn out of the Bank of Germany. Foreign credits exceeding a billion dollars were being withdrawn from Germany. The gold reserve of the Reichsbank of Germany had reached the minimum, and unless some relief was afforded it would be closed. France and other European countries would not come to the rescue. The Bank of England temporarily stepped in and made a loan which they could not follow up, and unless some relief was afforded the German Government would collapse and it was feared communism might get root there, and the whole world was interested in the stabilization of Germany, for to-day, my friends, no one nation can live to itself alone. [Applause.] No one nation can be rich, happy, and prosperous and other nations prostrate. If the nations of Europe were in a chaotic condition, their purchasing power would be destroyed, and the industries of America and the farmers of America would not be able to sell to them or to the other countries affected by it, and as an economic proposition it was to America's interest to stabilize conditions there. When the offer was made prices within a few days went up, but France took time to agree to the moratorium and prices dropped, and in some commodities dropped lower than they had been before the moratorium offer was made. But the announcement did have the effect of stabilizing credit conditions in Europe, and it kept Europe from being economically in a chaotic state. Those facts were given me briefly over the telephone from the White House. The hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means sustained and substantiated those findings, but, gentlemen, to-day what is the situation that confronts you? The President of the United States, the official spokesman for this Nation to the other nations of the world, suggested a moratorium. The other nations of the world finally agreed to it, and the agreement was embodied in the London protocol. What would happen to-day if the United States did not agree? Chaos would follow. All of the countries of the world would feel that the American Government was responsible, and I believe the welfare of the world, the welfare of the United States, demands that this moratorium bill pass this House.

If Europe should collapse, the purchasing power of her people would be destroyed, the panic would spread to the United States, and the surplus cotton, wheat, and manufactured products of the citizens of the United States would have a still further circumscribed market, and prices would go still lower than they are now. What great suffering and distress would my people be forced to undergo by such a calamity. I will not take the chance of inflicting this catastrophe upon them.

Something has been said about France having a preference. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WIGGLESWORTH] correctly detailed that, but, gentlemen, under the terms of the resolution itself France can not have any preference. No other nation can have any preference and obtain a moratorium from the United States. Why? The resolution says the United States will grant a moratorium only to those countries who grant moratoria to all of their debtors.

Another proposition has been brought in here that this would involve us in reparations. Nothing of the kind. This resolution has no connection whatever with the payment of German reparations to the Allies. I am unalterably opposed——

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. Does the gentleman state that only those countries which grant a moratorium to their own debtors would be given a moratorium under this resolution?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. What about those eight countries to which Germany does not owe anything?

Mr. CRISP. They entered the London agreement, and while they have no claims against Germany, they granted to all of their neighbors a moratorium on their intergovernmental debts. It was humanitarian on their part to come in and forego those debts for a year in order to help stabilize the world, because all countries are equally involved in the stabilization of the world.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. CRISP. I can not yield further.

Mr. RANKIN. That is a new phase.

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman is going to speak, and he can answer it when he speaks.

Mr. RANKIN. I will do it.

Mr. CRISP. All right. That is the situation. Now, gentlemen, much has been said about these foreign governments having the money here ready to pay these installments. I respectfully say that has no bearing whatever upon the issue involved. If it were admitted that they had the money here, or if it were admitted that they did not have it here, what difference does that make? The President of the United States suggested this moratorium, and the other nations agreed to it. They were advised by the Treasury Department, whether rightly or wrongly, that they would not be considered in default by the Treasury Department if the payments were not made. So, of course, they did not make them. They were waiting to see the course of events. They expected, of course, this moratorium resolution to pass and that they would not be expected to make the payments. So they made no provision for paying them. Is not that common sense? Why should they, with the foreign exchange involved and all of those things, send money over here when they were not expecting it to be used? In my judgment, if it had not been for this proposed moratorium, they would have had this money here and they would have paid the installments, and I am confidently expecting those nations of Europe to keep their solemn international agreements and pay the amount due the United States under their solemn agreements.

Now, it has been argued that the United States only had due it $6,000,000 of German reparations, which was a mere bagatelle. That is true, and that was only to pay a part of the expense of the cost of the Army of Occupation in Germany. Our Army went there at the request of Germany after the war, with the understanding that Germany was to pay the expense. The only money the United States has ever received from Germany is $65,998,512.13, the cost of the Army of Occupation, and $51,653,024.08 paid to cover the awards made by the Mixed Claims Commission, whereby American citizens were to be paid for damage to their property by Germany during the war. The United States has never received one foot of ground, and not a mark for war damage; no railroads and no property of any kind, notwithstanding the fact that the United States spent $39,000,000 plus in war expenses.

My friends, I am going to leave to others a more detailed argument as to economic conditions, for I desire to address you on section 5 of the resolution. But may I not say before I go to that—and when I was interrupted I was just about to say—that some people are being confused on account of the resolution naming reparations. Why does the resolution describe the amount of debts which those different countries owe each other? Germany owed the Allies $400,000,000 to be paid this year. She could not pay that money. Therefore it was proposed to grant this year's moratorium to relieve Germany from the payment for one year of this $400,000,000, in order to allow her to become stabilized. Reparations are used in the resolution to say to France, to England, to Belgium, and to all of those countries, that if they do not grant their debtor, Germany, a moratorium for a year on every kind of debt they have against Germany of a public character, including their claims for reparations, we will not grant them a moratorium on the amounts they owe us. America would have been foolish to have granted France and England a moratorium of what they owe America and then permit Great Britain and France to collect the reparations due them from Germany. That is the only reason reparations are in the resolution, describing the character of the debts on which other countries must grant moratoria in order to secure the benefit of our moratorium.

I had the privilege as well as the burden of serving on the American World War Debt Commission, and I know something of those settlements. Those settlements were extremely liberal and generous on the part of the United States. No country on earth has ever been as generous to its debtors as we were to our allied debtors. That commission took the position that it was going to fund debts according to capacity to pay, for, mark you, my colleagues, the debts owing to us were nothing but the moral obligation or promise to pay on the part of foreign nations. If they did not keep that promise, what recourse had we? There was no court to which we could go and obtain a judgment. If they did not voluntarily pay, the only recourse was by the arbitrament of arms, the declaration of war, and the sending of an army over. God forbid any such happening. This year, if there had been a collapse of Europe and there had been no moratorium, and had these European nations refused to pay their international debts—and it looks like they could not pay—what would have been your remedy as far as Germany is concerned? War would have been your only remedy.

I believe and always have believed that our allied debtors could pay, and I am expecting them to pay. [Applause.]

The total amount of principal and interest due to date of funding of the American World War debts was $11,522,354,000. Under the terms of the settlements to be paid over 62 years the interest amounts to $10,621,185,000, making the colossal total of $22,143,539,000. As a representative in Congress of the American people, I can not sacrifice their interest by voting to scale down or cancel this honest, just debt owing us by responsible nations of the world.

In my judgment, the Allies indebted to us could very easily meet the payments due the United States on account of war debts if they would enter into international agreements to reduce their military and naval establishments. The last available figures for a comparison between the amounts expended by the different countries for armaments and the amounts due by them to the United States were as of the year 1930. I include herein a statement of them:

Country	For armament	For debt to United States
Belgium	$23,247,347	$7,950,000
Czechoslovakia	41,056,000	3,000,000
France	547,133,935	50,000,000
Great Britain	608,024,880	159,520,000
Italy	322,337,000	14,706,000
Poland	122,995,000	7,486,000
Rumania	67,061,000	800,000
Yugoslavia	47,491,000	250,000

Oh, how much the world would gain, how much humanity would be benefited, what a relief it would be to the taxpayers of the earth if armaments could be reduced by international agreement! If this could be done, the security of each nation would be the same, for armaments are comparative, and if each nation had a small military armament its national protection would be relatively the same as if each had a large one, and at the same time the taxpayers of the world would be relieved of crushing tax burdens. My dear friends, what would be the practical effect of a cancellation of all war debts? It would be that the American taxpayer would have the burden of paying practically $16,000,000,000 and the citizens of other countries would be relieved of tax burdens to meet war debts. Why do I say this? Our allies owe us, as a rule, more than their allies owe them. Therefore a general cancellation would relieve the Allies of a greater indebtedness to the United States than is owed to them. I will give an illustration: France owes the United States under the funding agreement $4,025,000,000. France has claims for war debts against the Allies amounting to approximately $548,636,152. France also has a claim for some amount from Germany on account of German reparations to be paid her; but a general cancellation of debts would inure to her benefit to the amount of hundreds of millions of dollars. The United States can not cancel her $16,000,000,000 owing American citizens who hold her bonds sold to obtain money to prosecute the war or to loan to our allies for the same purpose. Do not these bonds represent war debt? Do those in the United States who advocate cancellation favor canceling the $16,000,000,000 war-rebt bonds issued by the United States? I for one would never agree to any such suggestion, for the faith and honor of the American Government must ever remain inviolate.

I am unalterably opposed to a revival of the American World War Debt Commission. I am opposed to reopening those settlements. I am opposed to scaling them down and I am opposed to canceling them. I think the best thing this Congress can do is to express an opinion and let the world know, let the international bankers of this country know, let all who advocate scaling them down know, and let the foreign governments know that there will be no reduction or cancellation of those debts, but that we expect them to be paid. If that knowledge is carried to them, I believe they will pay. [Applause.]

I think if this resolution accomplishes no other great purpose, though I think it does, if it carried along with it this notice to the world, it would be a great legislative act.

When the Foreign Debt Commissions arrived in the United States, your commission stated that the settlements made had to be final settlements. When the first French commission, the Caillaux commission, came over here, the American commission and that commission were unable to reach an agreement. Why? The Caillaux commission insisted on two conditions prior to making any agreement: One, that any agreement they might make to pay us must be dependent upon their receiving reparations from Germany, and if they failed to receive reparations from Germany, they were not to pay us; and the other was the right to reopen the settlement for review after five years.

The subcommittee of the American commission was composed of Mr. Hoover, then Secretary of Commerce and today the President of the United States, Mr. Mellon, Senator SMOOT, and myself. We took the position we would not make any settlement that was not to be a final settlement, not privileged to be reopened, and I stand right there today, although some of those gentlemen have changed their opinion.

Let me give you an idea as to how generous the settlements were, except that Great Britain's was a liberal settlement on the part of Great Britain. The cash value of the British settlement, reduced to its present value on a 4¼ per cent discount rate, is 80 cents on a dollar, on a 3 per cent discount rate it is 104 cents on the dollar. The French settlement on a 4¼ per cent discount rate is 47.2 per cent, or less than half, and on a 3 per cent basis 64.6. The Italian settlement on a 4¼ per cent discount is 24 and a fraction, and on 3 per cent, 36; Belgium, 46½ or 39.7.

And may I say right here, gentlemen, that France obtained from the United States after the armistice, for cash advances made to her after the armistice and for the sale of surplus war property, which was $400,000,000, practically $1,600,000,000 or $1,700,000,000, and the settlement made with France, in effect, simply asked France to pay back to the United States the money she received from the United States after the armistice and for the property she bought after the armistice. The effect of that settlement is to cancel the billions she received from the United States while actual war was going on, and every equity was extended her. She is not asked to pay back, under this settlement, funds obtained by her while the war was going on. France in her debt settlement owed us $4,025,000,000. The cash value of it on a 4½ per cent discount to-day is $2,010,000,000, or less than half, and she received as much after the war, plus the purchase price of war property, as the present cash value of her settlement.

Now, these are the conditions. I am not going to agree, so far as I am concerned, to vote to revive the War Debt Commission or to reopen those settlements or to scale down those settlements or to cancel them; and in the Ways and Means Committee I offered a much more drastic section 5 than the one that is now in the bill, but after discussion I finally withdrew mine and supported the one that was adopted.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield on that?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I would like to get the gentleman's views for my guidance as to whether or not, as a matter of policy, one Congress can bind or speak for future Congresses.

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman is smart and the gentleman knows it can not. The gentleman knows that if the Congress passed such a law, the next Congress could repeal it. The gentleman knows that quite well, but I think this Congress should let the world know the views of this Congress, and if the world is as smart as I think it is, it will know this Congress is reflecting the views of the American people. [Applause.]

This is my judgment about it. Let me say another thing. In the Senate the other day a question arose as to whether the State Department approved foreign loans. The distinguished Secretary of State appeared before us. He is an able, courteous, and frank man, and in executive session he would talk to us about anything. I secured his permission to make this statement on the floor. I asked him if any of the foreign governments had approached the State Department asking that these debts be reopened or asking for any cancellation, and he said no.

Who is doing it? I want this Congress to go on record and give an answer to whomsoever it may be that Congress is not going to do it.

Another proposition, I asked him if the State Department approved or disapproved of loans made by private bankers to Europe. He said they never approved, but they sometimes disapproved, and let me tell you that that was used once to my knowledge to the great advantage of the American people.

Right after the war Great Britain came voluntarily and freely and settled her debts on a generous basis, and if there can be any equity in a change as to any of them it is in the case of Great Britain. The other nations refused to come. They were repeatedly invited to come and they would not come, and, finally, the State Department took the position that they would not approve any international private loans to any of these countries or their citizens until their public debt was funded, and then they came and these settlements were made, and they vary from that of England of 80 per cent on the dollar to that of Italy of a little less than 30 cents on the dollar, and France's is a little less than 50 cents on the dollar.

The distinguished Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon, made a speech the other day over the radio and said that these settlements were based on the capacity to pay, and that if the capacity to pay had changed they should be opened again to settlement on capacity to pay.

My friends, there is no man with one ounce of intelligence who does not know that if these settlements were reopened, America will have to grant a further reduction. There is only one purpose, one object, and that is to scale them.

I am opposed to Mr. Mellon's position to-day, which is very different from what it was when the Cailaux commission was here. Then it was distinctly stated that no settlement would be made that was not a final settlement, and the capacity to pay was the basis of that settlement.

Mr. ESLICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Certainly.

Mr. ESLICK. Does the gentleman understand that any foreign government has asked for a scaling of these debts?

Mr. CRISP. I do not, and I will say that I presume that the Government agency that deals with foreign governments would receive that request if there was one, and the Secretary of State said that he never had any such request from any foreign government.

That is what I want everybody to know. As far as I am concerned I am not going to vote to scale or cancel these debts, and when the foreign governments know it, they will stop hoping and hoping, and I have no doubt they will be honorable and keep their agreements and pay the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ESLICK].

Mr. ESLICK. Mr. Chairman and ladies and gentlemen, I have sought a few minutes to discuss the proposition before the committee. There have been a large number of requests on our side of this question, and I want to be fair to other men who want to express their views on the moratorium.

I regret on the first measure that comes from the Ways and Means Committee I must dissent from my leadership. But so long as I am a Member of this House, no man, be he President of the United States, can commit me to a measure by a Western Union telegram. [Applause.] And no member of my party, or any other party, can commit me to a measure I believe hurtful to the great American people. [Applause.]

When the President wired me I answered him emphatically that I would not vote for the moratorium. I had my reasons for this, and they are stronger to-day after the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee, and I am more convinced to-day that I was right than ever before.

I have been amused at the arguments made here that there was no haste for the passage of this measure. The President had five and a half months to call Congress into an extra session, but on a previous occasion the President had some experience with an extra session and he did not want another. [Applause.]

We come here after three days' hearings before the Ways and Means Committee to take up this measure, and we are to-day passing upon it. I say to you lawyers of the House that we are an appellate court, hearing an appeal from the Ways and Means Committee, and yet you are called upon to pass upon this great lawsuit that indirectly involves $10,000,000,000 without the record before you. Can you vote upon it intelligently?

The members of the committee have not the record before them. It has not been printed at this time. I thought we should have had it before us with a reasonable time to study it. We worked until midnight last night to get the minority report in. We did not have access to the hearings.

Now, I do not impugn or challenge the motives of any man here. I have the highest regard and the highest respect for the members of the Ways and Means Committee. I challenge no man's right to vote for or against the measure. He is responsible to his own conscience, his constituency, and the country.

I assume that responsibility, and I shall meet it with my own people. I do not intend to vote for this measure, I have never intended to vote for it, because I believe it is wrong. In the first place, I do not believe that the President acted within his rights in making the agreement for this moratorium. I believe this as a lawyer. I am not going to discuss the legal aspects of this question. When the message flashed over the wire, I began to reason with myself. The first proposition was this: Who brought this situation about? Did America bring about the world-wide cataclysm? Was America responsible for this condition in Europe? Not at all. Germany brought about the World War. I think of the morbid and sordid picture drawn by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER]. I agree with him. They were four of the blackest years in history. The war destroyed four years that should have been devoted to a Christian civilization. It left 10,000,000 young men in their graves on the western front. It made 7,000,000 widows and 15,000,000 orphans, and it destroyed $150,000,000,000 worth of property. Who brought it about? We did not. When one of two peoples must suffer, is it not fair that the party who produced the cause should assume and bear the burden? When the issue was presented, I asked, In what better condition is my country than the countries on the other side? I heard my friend the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] discuss the international debt settlements. He presented it to the Congress. I heard him tell the Congress that these nations were paying to the utmost of their capacity to pay; and yet, my friends, take the single debt settlement of Italy. I represent an agricultural people, and they lifted from the shoulders of the Italians a great burden which, divided by congressional districts, placed a debt on my people of 7,000,000 bushels of corn at a dollar a bushel, and to-day under present prices it represents 28,000,000 bushels of corn. When I looked at the slide in prices, I saw that we had gone far down the hill, like the countries of the Old World. Let me call my friend's attention to this: When he tells you of the collapse in the old country and what might follow, turn your eyes upon your own land. You are slipping at the rate of $6,000,000 every day on the red side of the ledger. You are going into debt $250,000 every hour that yonder clock ticks off. Is there another nation in all the world to-day that is slipping as fast as we are? Your revenues are only one-half of the outgo. That is the President's own statement. Look out upon the cities and the great army of the unemployed. It is greater in America than in any country in all the world. Germany has her three and a half to five million people unemployed. Organized labor says that we have 7,000,000 unemployed in America. I look upon the great city of New York. It is the greatest monument to wealth that human history records, and yet in the face of those monuments of wealth stand the miles of unemployed.

As I understand, three-quarters of a million people within the environs of New York stand with outstretched hands for the gift of charity. Allowing four to a family, that means 28,000,000, or more than 20 per cent of the American people, idle, hungry, and half naked, and yet you tell me that we are in a position to step into the outside world and make these guaranties. I don't believe it. I believe charity begins at home. I have had a little experience. I helped to sell Government bonds in time of war. We carried out the instructions of the Secretary of the Treasury. We were told that this money would be loaned to our allies and that it would be paid back to us at the same rate of interest. Our people were told to buy until it hurt. I saw men who ought to have bought $1,000 buy $10,000. I saw the time come, after they had borrowed from the banks when they had plenty of money, when hard times were upon us and the banks needed the money. The bonds they bought had fallen to eighty cents on the dollar. The banks called on these people, and they mortgaged their little homes to the Federal land bank and other lending corporations, and when these debts were due the troubles of 1921 and 1922 were on hand, and they could not pay taxes and interest. There was no moratorium for those people, but a 30-day default in interest and they sold the house and home and farm from under them. When you sell the home of an American citizen, when you turn him into the highway and byway, you take from him an independence that belongs to the American citizen, and instead of patriotism you write resentment. In the last 10 years by involuntary sales 1,200,000 farms have been sold out of the 6,000,000 farms in the United States. What country in the world presents this picture? When you are declaring moratoriums, had you not better take care of the farmer and the fellow in his home, the American citizen, the man who knows how to accustom his shoulder to the musket and his hand to the saber in time of war, and in time of peace how to adapt his hand to the plow and help create the Nation's wealth? What country in the world can match 3,000 bank failures, with $2,000,000,000 liabilities, during the panic called a "depression" beginning in the autumn of 1929? No other country has such a record of misfortune. My appeal is for the American citizen. I have no unkind word for Germany, not a bit of it; but the gentleman tells us in these debt settlements that the countries of the Old World were paying to their utmost capacity. They could not pay us interest, they could not pay us honest money due us, but last year the very nations to which this moratorium applies expended 65 per cent more money in preparation for war than they spent in 1913. Do you know that last year the world spent more than $4,157,000,000 in armament in preparation for war, that the pathway that leads to the future some day may be made slippery with the warm, red blood of mankind? They are not able to pay us, but they are able to build the great fleets and establish the great armies, that the world again may witness the sacrifice of human life and the destruction of accumulated property. I ask unanimous consent to insert a statement showing the record by nations of the amounts contributed to the world's armament.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. ESLICK. I don't want to deal in personalities, but I listened with very great interest to the distinguished gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. EATON] in his peroration on the President. He told us the President, through his eyes and ears, saw and heard the cyclone that the people have not seen. Doctor EATON, tell the people they are happy that they have not seen what he has. If it has been any worse than that, which has been administered to the people in the business world in the last two years, may the Lord spare us and let us never see what the President has seen. I was amused at his statement, in the last analysis, to take care of the $40,000,000,000 private loans abroad, that represented the sweat and toil of the American people. What do the unparalleled losses in this country represent but the toil and sweat of our people? How are taxes to be paid or the deficit in the Treasury balanced except through the American people? When you postpone this indebtedness, our people now oppressed and staggering under the burdens of debt, you place an emergency tax of more than $2 upon every man, woman, and child in the United States. You fix a burden of $252,000,000 on the American taxpayers. You take this great burden from foreign governments that have not asked it and burden our people with it. As between the foreign taxpayers and the governments of Europe and the American taxpayers and the Government of the United States, I am for my Government and the home people. In good conscience my position and my appeal is—Let us first be just to our home people before we are generous to the peoples of Europe. [Applause.]

Mr. HAWLEY. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, never in the history of the Government has there been a time under our existing constitutional policy when the good faith of our Government has been tested as at the present moment. The prime objective of the moratorium was for the relief and rescue of Germany. Incidentally it was for the relief and rescue of all Europe. Incidentally it was for the relief and rescue of the United States. Germany was going to be bankrupted, then France and all continental Europe would likewise be bankrupted, and the bankrupt conditions of continental Europe would unquestionably affect the international trade relations of the United States.

I ask you, my fellow Democrats—if I may so describe you—if that great President of yours, who guided this country during the World War, were in the White House to-day or in June last when the financial cataclysm was sweeping over Europe, had received an appeal from the recognized authority of Germany, the President of the Reich, that unless some relief were granted from the payment of its war debts then Germany would be in a condition of absolute chaos, would he, under his constitutional right as Executive of the Nation, with the power and right to negotiate treaties, have dodged his responsibility, or would he have done just what the present President of the United States, who also took such a commanding part during the World War in the relief of war-stricken Europe, did—initiate the negotiations that brought about the moratorium?

No one can question here that under the Constitution the executive power is vested in the President, and that he has full right to determine the foreign relations of the National Government, subject, so far as they are embodied in treaties, to ratification by the Senate. He has the right to inaugurate and communicate on all matters relating to our foreign relations. And if perchance the President of the United States did not undertake formal agreement in the way of a treaty for submission to the United States Senate, nevertheless the President was within his constitutional right in inaugurating this moratorium and submitting it to the Congress for ratification, because, and because alone, it affected the revenues of the Government.

I do not say that the President should not have convened Congress earlier to approve it, but he had a constitutional right to inaugurate it, and he had the constitutional right to submit it to the Congress of the United States for ratification.

Every event in European affairs that has followed since this was made public confirms the fact that the President was right and was not misled by the president of the Reich in inaugurating this moratorium.

Mr. SIROVICH. Why did the President not call a special session?

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman must ask the President. Perhaps it was because he had received assurances from a majority of the Members of Congress that the moratorium would be ratified, but whatever his reason was, whether there were Members abroad, or whether by reason of the close vote between the parties he did not want to have Congress on his hands, which I think was the real reason, because he had suffered badly from his prior experience even when he had a large majority in the House in his support; never theless, whatever the reason was, he was within his constitutional right in negotiating the moratorium and submitting it to the Congress.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Assuming the President was wrong, does that justify us in voting wrong?

Mr. STAFFORD. Just merely because the matter has been deferred six months, if the facts that have occurred since then have not changed the picture, why then should we refuse approval? The question before us is whether we are going to renounce the representative of our Government in foreign affairs and have him held up to ridicule; have the United States Government held up to ridicule, that we can not be counted upon to support the President on a proposition that essentially is within the province of the Executive to initiate and negotiate.

Only yesterday that criticism was reflected in the French papers. Pertinax, one of the foremost political writers in Paris, was chiding our country for not supporting the President in matters of foreign policy. To-day we should put aside partisan politics and look at the proposal in the broad light of what is our duty as the foremost financial nation of the world.

Mr. RAYBURN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. RAYBURN. What would the gentleman think if, when the President was negotiating the treaty, the Democrats had met and a majority of them had signed a "round robin" when he was engaged in international affairs like some Republicans did in 1919? [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. That would have given him notice and given notice to the countries affected by the moratorium that it might be expected there would be opposition to this proposal. But no such opposition occurred. He conferred not only with Republicans but he conferred with the leading Democrats on the Committee on Foreign Affairs of both Houses and with the members of the Committee on Ways and Means. Then he sent telegrams to every Member of the Senate and House and received assurances from a large majority of each House that they favored the proposal. It was an exigent condition. Time was the essence of the arrangement. Having the constitutional authority to negotiate treaties, if he had not taken the initiative, Germany might have succumbed and the flame of destruction would have extended to France and all continental Europe.

Mr. SIROVICH. But Germany never asked for the moratorium.

Mr. STAFFORD. President von Hindenburg did make his appeal to the President for a moratorium by reason of the very conditions then existing.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not yield.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I can not yield further.

The Darmstadt Bank, one of the largest in Germany, with branches in Austria, Hungary, and other European countries, had suspended payments. Since then Great Britain had to yield to the demands of her seamen, the most ignominious act in the history of the British nation, because she was in such a critical condition that the Government could not stand up and say "You must obey the commands of your Government." Britain since has suspended gold payments. Japan recently has suspended gold payments. France, by its attitude at that time, thought she would not be affected by this conflagration that was spreading and might ultimately involve all Europe and affect the entire world, but she, too, later realized the necessity of yielding to the moratorium.

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield for a brief question.

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. How many of the nations mentioned in the resolution have ability to pay now?

Mr. STAFFORD. The question is larger than that. The gentleman might say we should not do this because Germany has revived and that now the balance of trade is in her favor. But that is no reason why we should not grant this moratorium. The principal argument in favor of the suspension of the payment of the entire war debt for one year is that Germany has revived; she has not been obliged to suspend gold payments, she was given a breathing spell so as to revive by not being required to meet for one year her war-debt payments of more than $400,000,000. The answer to the gentleman's question is that the President rightly forecasted what would happen if Germany were exempted from the payment of $400,000,000. It is like any other creditor who is relieved from the payment of debts. Germany was enabled to use that $400,000,000 for her own improvement. Instead of paying it and having it in turn parceled out to France, Great Britain, Belgium, and the United States, she was able to use it for her own industrial revival. [Applause.]

It saved the German Government from a complete collapse, and perhaps a political revolution. The international events that have occurred since confirms the wisdom of the President in inaugurating this debt suspension. Let us now support the President in an act that was intended for and did redound to the benefit of the German people and the Reich.

The legislative branch of our Government is being tested to-day as to its capacity to do its full duty. No matter what is the politics of the President, I call upon you to sink partisan feelings and rise to your full measure to view our foreign affairs with disinterested eye for what is best for country and all the nations of the world.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of giving a little history in regard to our debt settlements which may not be familiar to Members of the House generally, and what I say has bearing on a question now disturbing some of the Members regarding cancellation of debts.

When the resolution for European debt settlements was first presented to the committee, prior to the Dawes settlement, it provided that the Secretary of the Treasury alone should make the settlements. At that time Secretary of the Treasury Mellon was requested, as members of the committee at that time may remember, to come before the committee and discuss certain amendments which I had to offer. Secretary Mellon came, I believe, in executive session. The first amendement which I suggested, and which was afterwards adopted, was that instead of the Secretary a commission should make the settlements. That commission was later formed and had on its membership Mr. CRISP, of Georgia, and other able men in and out of Congress. That commission made all the settlements. A second provision in the debt settlement resolution was that there should be no cancellation of debts, also an amendment I offered. It is an important provision that was incorporated in the resolution. At first it was objected to by the Secretary because he said it might prove embarrassing in the settlements, but eventually the objection was withdrawn and that went into the resolution. The third amendment was that there should be no substitution of securities for the debts of any debtor country, because there was talk at that time of substituting German and Austrian securities for securities we expected to get from France, England, and the other countries. That was objected to in like manner, but eventually it was written into the resolution. Two other amendments were at that time suggested to the Secretary and were afterwards adopted. One had to do with the limitation of time for settlements and the other with publicity. Those five amendments were adopted and they are interesting at this time because of the fear of cancellation and substitution. It has always been the policy of this Government in all settlements that have been made that there should be no cancellation or substitution of securities. Our own attitude is clear on the subject.

I speak of that because it has to do with the question which is before us. There is no intention with Congress to cancel the debts, as the President and others have announced. In this connection, it should be remembered that our Government does not hold one dollar of German securities nor does Germany owe us anything. She does owe England, France, Italy, and other countries that owe us $11,000,000,000, and these debtor countries depend on German reparations to them with which to pay us.

When as a Government, through the Debt Settlement Commission, we permitted France to reduce her war debt 50 per cent and Italy 75 per cent there is no comparative loss to be feared by the United States in extending interest payments to them for one year, when a world-wide situation confronts us as it does in connection with the possible overthrow of the political and economic government of Germany. I believe there is a large majority in this House of the same opinion—that there is no comparison between a quarter of a billion dollars extended interest to England, France, and other debtors for one year when, on the other hand, we have in the past canceled several billion dollars in order to relieve all these war debtors from their debts to us. In the latter case the American public pays all debts remitted to France, Italy, and other countries. The moratorium does not remit one dollar of debts due from those countries but extends for one year their 1931 payments to us, and on that they agree to pay 4 per cent annually, according to the bill. These countries depend on payments from Germany to them to pay us. If Germany fails them, they may fail us.

When last in Germany, four years ago, I saw more red flags in the city of Berlin on one Sunday than I saw in all Russia, and I was in Russia two months and traveled from one end of the country to the other.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman one additional minute.

Mr. FREAR. It occurred in this way: There was a communist celebration in Berlin at that time, and frankly I was startled at the display of communism in conservative Germany. In Russia we were informed by Russian commissars that the Bolsheviks during the war had spread communistic propaganda among the Germans more than among any other people or in any other country.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; certainly.

Mr. HOWARD. The gentleman said we voted these millions to France. Will not the gentleman be kind enough to permit me to say I did not take part in that wickedness.

Mr. FREAR. If the gentleman will find that statement in my remarks, I will be willing to correct it. I did not say that we voted those millions but that we confirmed those settlements. I do not know whether the gentleman, as a Member of the House, took part in that; but we accepted the decision of our own Members on the commission that the settlements contained all that the debtor countries were able to pay, for be it remembered if a default in payments occurs, the only way to enforce payment is by war, and the American people do not want another war, nor if they have the decision, will they engage in another foreign war.

Mr. Chairman, if a house was on fire or in smoking ruins and it threatened the safety of adjoining buildings, I would not question the motives or purposes of those who were putting out the fire. The first thing to do would be to put out the fire and save surrounding buildings. If the regular fire department was not handy, I do not believe the chief fireman would refuse to accept any aid.

That is the position of Germany and the United States with the moratorium. I was in Germany shortly after the war. I saw long lines of crippled, hungry men and women and children in the streets of Berlin and other cities. The mark was then dropping so fast that stores were only kept open a half day. At Ambassador Houghton's residence I met some of those who had been in power in former days. Germany was without business, without money except the depreciated paper mark, and distress and poverty were on every hand. I am discussing this condition in its relation to the moratorium. All of her domestic debts were canceled with the downfall of the paper mark. The people lost all their savings.

All of the French domestic debts were also scaled down to the French holders 80 per cent with the fall of the franc. It looked as though peace in Europe was as bad as war. In fact it is doubtful that Germany would have weathered the storm after the war but for the strong hand of President von Hindenburg at the helm. Remember, Germany is now a republic, and no one will hold the German people responsible for former acts of their deposed war leaders. The people have little voice in any country with declarations of war. Once in war they have no alternative but to fight. The World War is over and the great problem in Europe is whether the new governments that have repudiated their kings, czars, and emperors will survive as republics.

Communism and distress is found threatening more than one European country in addition to its control of Russia.

That is due to war, and Germany is not alone concerned with the future. The whole civilized world is involved. Under debt settlements with Great Britain, France, Italy, Czechoslovakia, and other countries $11,000,000,000 loaned by the United States to these countries during and after the war were scaled down so that not 50 per cent of the loans made by the United States will be repaid if placed on a cash basis. Loans to France and Italy were scaled down approximately 50 per cent for France and down to 25 per cent on the dollar for Italy, as stated.

This settlement would not repay to us the money we loaned these countries for rehabilitation after the armistice was signed. These settlements were made with the approval of Congress on the theory that a half loaf or a quarter of a loaf from Italy was better than no bread at all.

With reparations due from Germany to the victors, it was long ago admitted by all countries that the terms were so heavy that Germany would repudiate all her war settlements and make no effort to save herself from threatened economic ruin.

America was then begged by European powers to help adjust a critical situation and the Dawes plan was the outcome. That plan of reparations would have weighed down a prosperous Germany, but when worn out, with few industries working, word soon came that the Dawes plan was also impossible to carry out. Another settlement was prepared, and Young, also an American, arranged what was known as the Young settlement, secured by rail customs and other sources of income. These reparations were to be paid to the European allies and would help to pay their debts to us.

American money followed, poured into Germany, secured by local, municipal, and German Government bonds. Bankers are now blamed for urging poor securities on the American public. I believe they were largely responsible for high-pressure salesmanship, and although many billions of dollars in private funds went to Germany and helped start the wheels in her mills and factories, the money was taken from such bonds floated by bankers with the American people.

That, in brief, is the record of Germany's debt settlements since the war. Germany did not owe the United States one dollar excepting in private debts. We made loans to the victors—to England, France, Italy, and other countries—to rehabilitate Europe, but none to Germany. Our people bought German bonds, but the United States Government did not loan anything to Germany.

Great Britain, France, Italy, Belgium, were German victors that agreed to pay the United States during a period of over 62 years, but depending first upon German payments to these European countries under the Young reparation plan. They paid us if Germany paid them. When Germany stopped paying them, then they stop paying us. That is their proposition now.

There is no disagreement thus far in the story of Europe's war debts. In May, last summer, President Hoover was advised that the German Reichsbank, her financial center, was to close because of serious financial difficulties. With that bank crash no reparations would be paid by Germany to her European victors and they would not pay to the United States. Germany was not alone threatened by communism, but all Europe and America were possibly involved to some extent in the storm. Was Germany worth saving? Without Germany, from an American viewpoint, we might lose the $11,000,000,000 that would only be paid us through German reparations, according to European claims.

That was a threatened conflagration in time of peace almost as serious as in time of war. President Hoover believed the situation critical. By giving Germany a breathing spell, order could be brought out of chaos. President von Hindenburg proposed a one year's postponement of Germany's debt interest and reparation payments to her victors, and France and our other debtors were finally won over to the plan if they were to be relieved in their payments to us for 1932 by a year's extension.

The President acted. He wired Senators and Members the situation as he believed it to be. He did not call Congress together because that would have taken time, long debates, and in the meantime the house might burn down as did Rome while Nero fiddled.

When word was received from a majority of Senators and Members from both Houses of Congress, whether Democrats or Republicans, the President negotiated with Germany, England, France, and all the other countries to give a 1-year moratorium or extension of their joint debts to Germany on condition the United States would extend their payments for one year. Not cancellation of their debts but a moratorium for one year. It was the only solution of a critical situation in world affairs.

Mr. Chairman, possibly we were mistaken, possibly Germany was not bankrupt and did not need the year of grace, but neither the President nor Congress could withhold consent in the face of a threatened collapse, because if Germany defaulted, all others would default. For selfish reasons, if from no higher motives, that was the course to pursue.

The President may not have known all the facts, but he knew far better than we did and, in any event, was ready to postpone the $250,000,000 annual interest and debt payments to us from our debtors, to put Germany on her feet.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHIPERFIELD] interrupts to ask insertion of actual amounts loaned and canceled for France and Italy. They are set forth herewith.

The funded principal of the French loan, $4,025,000,000, and interest due of $2,822,674,104 to time of settlement amounted to $6,847,674,104. Amount to be paid in 62 years on a 4¼ per cent interest basis, $11,474,900,000. Total French debt canceled on 4¼ per cent basis, $4,627,225,895.

On the same basis Italy's debt was $2,042,000,000 principal, interest $365,677,500. Total due to time of deferred payment, $5,821,552,000. Total Italian debt canceled, $3,413,874,500.

On the same basis, Great Britain's debt was $4,600,000,000 principal, interest $6,505,965,000. Total, $11,105,965,000. Total British debt canceled, $2,008,207,000. Or a total cancellation for these three nations, on a 4¼ per cent basis, of $10,040,307,000.

The above is from table prepared at request of Hon. Theodore E. Burton by the Treasury Department in 1929. According to data offered to the House by Representative HASTINGS, it further appears amounts expended by the above three countries in recent armaments reached in 1930—Great Britain, $608,024,880; France, $547,133,935; Italy, $322,337,000. The United States exceeded all other countries with its 1930 war expenditures reaching: Navy, $357,806,219; Army, $339,906,459; total, $697,712,678, or about $6 for every man, woman, and child in this country is being expended in time of peace, or double the $348,000,000 we spent in 1914 for war purposes.

With these startling figures practically for maintenance alone, Congress now further confronts a new great "parity" Navy bill carrying more than a billion dollars additional and a soldier conscription bill for 4,000,000 men for European service, if need be—all in time of peace. The naval and military forces in this country are again in the saddle.

I have set forth the war debt facts briefly. The war is long past. That is water over the wheel and responsibility for that war will never, never be settled. It takes two or more persons to make a quarrel and that is true of wars among nations.

The last war will stay with us in our debt settlements over 50 years more to reach the last of Europe's debt settlement. That is, if we ever realize on these debts. I have quoted to the House repeatedly predictions by soldiers, writers, statesmen, and others that another war is in the making. Some prophets claim it will come within 10 years, others fix a later date. They do not know just when it will come, but they do know that between bitter resentment over the treaty of Versailles, which carved up Germany, Austria, Turkey, and Russia, a smoldering fire is likely to break out as it did through the Alsace-Lorraine bone of contention that helped provoke the World War between Germany and France.

France and Italy are feverishly racing in their competitive naval programs, and we are invited to join that race by the pending billion-dollar new naval program in Congress. Battleships are soon obsolete but serve to keep alive the naval race and our injection into another European war to end wars.

The last war reported, 13,000 casualties among the Thirty-second Division of Wisconsin and Michigan boys thrown into battle as "shock troops," or approximately 50 per cent were disabled of the full strength of that division. I do not know whether propaganda, largely false in the past, will again seize the American Congress and force us into another European war.

Judging from the Spanish-American and World Wars, I do know that war hysteria is promoted by propaganda so that Congress becomes overwhelmed by Lord Northcliffe and other powerful influences from abroad, while our own press and war interests are always ready to believe potential enemies are on the job to injure us. If war comes to Europe, it seems certain again to involve us, because the same war interests will arouse Congress and the President to a declaration of war before the American people have learned to know the real causes for European disagreements. Like business panics and business depression, war is reoccurring.

All debts now owing to us will be infinitesimal and of no value compared with the cost and casualties certain to come from another war.

For that reason I have again reoffered a resolution (H. J. Res. 103) which provides:

Congress shall have power to declare war only after the proposition shall have been submitted by the President to the several States and a majority of the States at general or special election, called by the governors thereof, shall have approved the same. This amendment shall not be construed to prevent the President from using the Army and Navy to suppress insurrections and to repel invasions.

"The right of the people to be secure in their persons shall not be violated by conscription or forced military service, but when public safety demands Congress may provide for forced military service on the North American continent and in no other place."

I shall later remind the House of some of the arguments and propaganda influences used in other wars that are again calculated to force Congress to declare war and of influences of Presidents on Congress to the same end, not for the purpose of criticizing past wars or their inception but to urge permitting the people who fight and pay the bills to have the decision.

This is not directly involved in the moratorium before us, but if we would have no more moratoriums we should have no more European wars; and if we would avoid such wars let us place the decision with those who bear the war burdens.

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN].

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, I hope no gentleman will interrupt me in the few moments I have.

In the hot days of the summer the President of the United States honored me by sending me a telegram. I did not have time, in a good manner, to answer it, but I am going to answer it to-day. [Laughter and applause.]

I have listened to a lot of this talk. One gentleman told about the President of the United States, Mr. Hoover, seeing the storm and the great trouble abroad. I want to tell you in this RECORD so the President can read about some of the storms and troubles we have here in the United States. He does not have to go across the briny deep to the European countries to see what has been described here to-day. He can see it in every congressional district of the United States. He can see it all the way from Canada to the Gulf of Mexico. He can see it from New York City clear out to San Francisco.

Does the President know that throughout this country 7,000,000 people, honest, faithful, working men and women who have been working in the stores and factories and sawmills and in every kind of industry are to-day in idleness, and many of them begging for bread? Does he know that throughout this country good, faithful working people are walking barefooted? Does he know that in this country of America farmers in every State in this Union have borrowed money from the Federal farm-loan banks and that their homes, where these men have worked from the date of their birth up to 60 years of age, due to the great panic that has been growing on, are being lost through foreclosure of what we call mortgages; and that men and women, industries and banks have bought the bonds and not a single one of those bank bonds to-day is worth over 75 per cent, and I think most of them are worth less than 33⅓ per cent. Yet we hear of troubles over yonder in Europe.

You have here in the United States the man who produces cotton getting a little measly sum of 5 cents a pound for cotton that has cost him 10 cents a pound. You see them getting a few cents for oats, you see them getting a few cents for wheat, and you see fine cattle in the fields here that sell on the hoof for 2 cents and 4 cents a pound. Yet the President fails to see this.

In every town and village and in every city of the United States there are vacant stores, vacant houses, because people are unable to pay rent. In every community from the biggest town to the smallest village, you see people in want and in poverty.

In the United States the stocks and bonds of the great railroad systems are going down to zero. The great railways of this Republic, that have always been good investments, to-day none of them can sell their stock or sell their bonds. The bonds of a great railway system that were worth 105 to-day are quoted at 15. Stock that was worth 200 is quoted at 36, and one stock that was worth 167 is down to 9½.

Factories in every line of industry, where thousands of good men and women were once at work earning a good living, are idle to-day. In every State in the Union you see this. You see it in Pennsylvania, where the great rolling mills and cement factories were once operating regularly; to-day they are idle, with broken window glass and the men who worked in them idle. All this I call to the attention of Mr. Hoover.

Do you know that in every State of this Union, following the very worst panic we have ever had, we are almost in the state of being in the Dark Ages? Why can he not see this storm here at home?

Talk about this Congress being called on to grant to Germany and to all other European nations the gratuity of a moratorium, who is going to give these farmers a moratorium? Every day you see in the papers of your district where they are selling out these honest farmers because they can not pay their installment payments and the interest. Yet you are called on to give away all this money over yonder in Europe. You are called upon as representatives of the people to do this.

Understand me, you are not here to grant special favors to these grafting international bankers in Wall Street and elsewhere that have imposed on the people by selling them these worthless bonds. Do you not know that this is a scheme to protect these men, a bunch of exploiters in this Republic who have been growing fat while everybody else has been losing money and some starving to death? They issue these bonds and sell them to the American people after taking off 15 or 20 per cent as their profit and putting it in their own pockets. This is the bunch of gentlemen that are behind this moratorium, and you need not fool yourselves. They mean for us to act the big fool and to grant this special favor to the privileged bankers who have robbed our American people through selling these bonds so that all this money they have loaned over yonder in Europe, especially in the great country of Germany—and it is a great country—so that they can have the Government finally cancel all of that money that they owe us, and then they will be able to collect their money and put it in their own pockets.

We have the situation of honest men and women on this floor being called upon to make these people safe and to let our people go broke and many go hungry.

Taxes are already so high in this country that we can not raise them, and we are going to be $3,000,000,000 in the hole in our Government by the first of next July, and you gentlemen know it. Yet you are called on to let these countries over there have an extension of a year in which to pay the amount they owe the United States.

Why do you not give the farmers a moratorium on their farms? All these people in this Republic I consider our people, and our people must have some way to live as well as the people abroad. Our people, and when I say our people I mean the citizens of the United States of America, and that is the country in which the President, in my judgment, ought to see the storm.

My friend from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] was talking about seeing red flags over in Germany. If we follow this policy, including this high tariff that you have put on us and which the President has said must stand—and understand, in my judgment, that is one of the causes of our being in this awful fix to-day, because you cut off our markets abroad in which to sell the produce from the farms and factories of this country, and that is the reason your railway systems are going into bankruptcy, and that is the reason your farmers are going into bankruptcy.

Talk about banks failing in Germany. Hell, they have failed by the thousands all over the United States. All over Pennsylvania and all over the West, all over the North, all over the South, you have these failures of banks and then talk about two failing in Germany.

You better think about the banks in the United States. Let us think of what is happening in the United States.

You are going to cause the red flag to be brought up here if you keep on treating the American people like you do.

You hear talk about the President seeing a cloud over in Germany. I say that we have not only got a cloud here, but we have a thunderstorm here already. It will take this Congress to take care of the United States of America, in my judgment, because we have a great crisis here and not only a crisis but a dangerous future.

We are not only facing a dangerous future, but we are standing on the brink of the precipice now. Every man better keep his eyes open and watch his step. I have a feeling for the American citizen, I have a feeling for the people of this country. We must look out for our own fireside.

Do you know that all the way from the humble cottage of the poor man, with his wife and children around him, clear up to the palace of the rich, this depression is affecting them? Rockefeller and Henry Ford and that type of men are losing money and so is everybody all the way down to the little peanut vender right here in the United States. We are called on by this resolution to ignore all of them in order to go to Europe and help them.

My friends, I may vote wrong, but I am going to vote with my heart. I am going to vote for the flag of this Republic.

I stand for the flag of the United States. I stand for the rich as well as the humble homes. We are called upon to perform a duty, and my vote is for the American people against the moratorium for foreign governments.

Mr. CANFIELD. By authority of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER] I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. RAGON].

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the House, I can not attract your interest and attention as did my spectacular friend from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN], but I do crave your attention for a few minutes.

I think this question should suggest itself to the House in that serious attitude that I think should surround the most important question since I have been a Member of this House.

So far as I am personally concerned, I favor the provisions of the moratorium. I may be wrong. I can see nothing incompatible with the Constitution of the United States in the actions that have been taken. In this I may be wrong. But there is one thing in which I know I am not wrong, and that is in following and supporting, after he has made a difficult and deliberate and honest effort to serve the welfare of this country, I am not wrong in following the President of my country. [Applause.]

There never walked a man who thought more of Woodrow Wilson than I. [Applause.] There never walked a man in the United States that regretted more the Republican round robin that occurred in a branch of this great Congress in opposition to some of his policies than I, but shall I adopt such tactics which I did not think right at that time on this occasion? I am as seriously convinced as I am of anything, that this country to-day stands in just as great peril as it did in 1917 and 1918. I wish some of you could have sat in the executive session of that committee and have seen the concern that manifested itself upon the face of one of the highest officials of this Government, and the one most intimately connected with international affairs in this country. I am one who subscribes to another philosophy in American Government, and that is that I do not care what man is elevated to the Presidency of the United States, or from what party he comes, he is no ordinary man. I am not ready to say that the President of the United States, regardless of party or social standing, is a man who does not appreciate the obligations that go with the oath that he takes for the high office of President of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAGON. No; I can not yield. Then, again, gentlemen, I am further convinced of this fact, that we have not selected a President of the United States who in his heart sought to fill up the Cabinet of his administration with men who were impelled by dishonest motives. If there is any man who knows what the international relations of this country are with the different nations of the earth, that man is the Secretary of State. I ask my colleagues, particularly those on the Democratic side of the aisle, to bear these things in mind, because I know that honestly in your heart and mind and conscience, your feeling is identical with mine.

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAGON. No; I can not yield. The Secretary of the Treasury, of course, has an intimate knowledge of the financial affairs of the world. Some of my friends, men whom I greatly love, are opposed to this. I can not keep from believing that they have prejudged this question not on the real merits of the issue, but by the columns of the newspapers. Gentlemen, are you going to take the highly colored headlines and the news items that appear in the great American newspapers and also European, and cast aside the testimony of men who have to handle the affairs of this Government in its international relations? Something has been said here, and at first blush it appears to come with good grace, to the effect that there is such mystery about all these negotiations. There has to be a mystery when it comes to handling international affairs between this country and foreign countries. Look for just a moment at the situation that might have occurred if Mr. Hoover in the negotiation of these terms of the moratorium had given advertisement to the world of what he was about to do. It would have caused a complete breakdown in Europe. Negotiations of such character must be quiet; yes, "mysterious," if you please. Let us look at the situation for a moment.

There was a bank failure in Austria that started the great disturbance. It grew to such proportion that President von Hindenburg on June 5 issued an ultimatum the effect of which was to increase taxes, and necessarily, therefore, alarm, because evidently the German Government did not take into consideration the serious purport of such an ultimatum outside the confines of Germany. In the second week of June there came a terrific withdrawal of gold and foreign exchange from the reserves of the Bank of Germany. That continued up until the week of June 20, and in that time over a billion reichsmarks, or $250,000,000, had been drawn from the reserves, represented in gold and foreign exchange, from the Bank of Germany. In the last two days, I have been informed, a large part of those withdrawals occurred. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON] said that it was strikingly strange, it was a mysterious coincidence, that the President of the United States should have made up his mind to grant this moratorium on the 20th, and that President von Hindenburg on the same day should have sent a letter to President Hoover. The Secretary of State notified the French ambassador, Mr. Claudel, on Thursday before Saturday, June 20, that a moratorium would be proposed. He advised him in the early part of the forenoon. Therefore the von Hindenburg letter was addressed two days after the first communication of Mr. Hoover's intention. What did the President then do?

The President sent telegrams to different Members of Congress. Two hundred and seventy-six men responded favoring this proposal. I have forgotten the number in the Senate, but, if I remember, it was 68. Here is the President of the United States first notified of these direful conditions by Ambassador Sackett, prior to even June 5, intimately familiar with the conditions in Germany, and then after the receipt of these telegrams from Representatives and Senators, as a representative of my country and your country, he undertakes the task of completing this moratorium.

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAGON. I have twice refused my good friend from Texas, but I can not longer refuse him.

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. I just want to know if the gentleman thinks those telegrams are binding unless the President stated all the facts?

Mr. RAGON. I can speak for no one but myself, but it is binding on me so far as I am concerned, and it has been so considered by me ever since [applause], and when I heard the testimony coming from the acknowledged representatives of my country in international affairs I say it made me all the stronger in my position. My friends have also found great objection to the fact that there are eight countries who are not parties to the reparations. Let us look at those countries. That sounds like a pretty bad thing, but, as the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] said awhile ago, after you examine the matter it appears nothing more than a scarecrow or a straw man. Of the $252,000,000 that we forebear on the part of our debtors, how much do you suppose these seven countries pay in?

They pay in only $4,000,000. Four of those seven countries are infant countries, Jugoslavia being one of them. Finland is an old country, but two other countries, Austria and another, are countries that themselves have reparations to pay. There is nothing to such an argument when you consider $248,000,000 due from governments drawing reparations.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAGON. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. Are we going to grant a moratorium to these people in order that they can pay reparations to somebody else?

Mr. RAGON. No. My friend was present in the committee, I think, when I asked the question of Mr. Mills. And he answered, "I do not see how our country is going to grant a moratorium to one of our debtor countries and deny it to the other." As I say, it was a very small friendly act on the part of our Government in extending to these small countries the same postponement of their annual debt as they did to the other countries.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN] puts into the argument an element that I am sure does not appeal to your intelligence very strongly, when he talks about the distress in this country. We all know that. There is not a man here on either side of the aisle whose heart does not bleed for those people who are unemployed. I would hate to think we had a President of the United States whose heart did not rotate deep interest around the sufferings of our people to-day. I do not think there is a man on this floor who thinks that. There is not a man on this floor who believes that his fellow Congressmen feel that way. I wonder how many bills my friend from Mississippi has introduced to relieve this situation. How many bills has he introduced to give a moratorium to the farmers of this country? I will answer the question as far as I am concerned. I have been working on one for a week. I do not know whether I have the sense to prepare it properly or not. If the bill which we will pass to-morrow will not cover it, I shall continue my work, but each of you have upon your shoulders and upon your conscience the same burden as the President of the United States to help our distressed people. It is our job. We do not have to wait for the President to come here and tell us that we must do something to relieve that suffering. We can initiate methods of relief ourselves. Primarily the burden comes to our shoulders.

My friends, such as the argument of my friend from Mississippi is simply building a straw man to becloud and befuddle the minds of these men and women who have upon their shoulders the duty of discharging this serious responsibility.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAGON. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Referring to the gentleman's farm bill, does the gentleman expect to get any more support from the other side of the aisle than he did for his amendment to this bill in committee yesterday?

Mr. RAGON. I do not know. I will tell the gentleman what I think. Well, I am not going to defend them in the committee. They still have their opportunity to strike that amendment out which I put in there.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. None of them will make the motion.

Mr. RAGON. That is their business. It is not mine.

Now, on the question of the international banks that my friend speaks about, I do not like their practices any better than he does, but we have sat here through 10 long years, and we have not done a thing that I have ever heard of in the House of Representatives to curb the activities of those men. Have you?

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas five additional minutes.

Mr. RAGON. The gentleman inveighs against the international banker. Why does he so inveigh? Only to becloud the issue. He denounces them because they have gone down there and sold to the little banks and individuals of his country bonds of Germany, which represent improvements in German municipalities and German corporations, and so forth. His objection to the international bankers is because they have hoodwinked some men down in his district in Mississippi and some men in my district in Arkansas with these bonds, all of them catapulted into commerce through the acts of the international bankers. That is a terrible scarecrow. Whenever you vote down this resolution, I ask you what are you going to do to the American banking system? Paralyze it? Yes. You will wreck the banks in the great cities of this country, in our great American metropolis and three or four years ago no man dared stand up and even suggest their weakness. Whenever you paralyze the banks of New York, what are you going to do down in Joplin, Mo., and in Little Rock, Ark.? I do not have any more use for the activities of the international banker than my friend QUIN, but I call this to his attention, that when his vote is cast in this House, and this resolution is killed, then, my friend, you will see the tottering form of Germany go to the junk pile inside of 30 days; and where is the value of that bond that they have sold to your farmer and business man down in Mississippi? That argument I think is mere raillery, but it is answering the argument of raillery by my good friend from Mississippi.

As I see it, this is a stupendous question. It is something more than simply the amount of money involved, because this money, compared to even the value of the appropriations that we make for the purpose of sustaining our War and Navy Departments, is but pocket change. Although it is small, I think if France had come across in a reasonable time and embraced the proposition we would have had much better times than we have had, due to the manifestations of the quick upturn in the stocks of this country and the stocks of Europe immediately upon the announcement of such a moratorium. But, my friends, the delay of France simply killed the psychological effect that this moratorium had. However, that is where we acted foolishly. Many people went about shouting from the housetops everywhere that this meant restoration of the prosperity we had between 1923 and 1929. My friends, its only effect was the psychological effect it had upon the European nations and the raising up of friendly relations for us in Europe, which we badly needed.

But it was a healthy psychology. It was one that was working well. I say to you that if you want to have a psychological effect directly opposite to what you had at that time, then vote down this resolution. But, I can not believe you will do so.

I said to you as I began, I suppose I am as red-hot a Democrat as anyone, but I can go over the shadow line of my partisan feelings when my country is involved. [Applause.] Regardless of whether or not the Republicans stood with Woodrow Wilson and may have not done so in a reprehensible way, do not let us imitate them in this year of our Lord when we have a Republican President in the White House.

Let me tell you something. As surely as I am standing on this floor, I firmly believe that these things are going to be battled out under the administration of a Democratic President, and I say to you, let us deal intelligently with these serious international questions which are now confronting us and which affect not only our existence but the existence of the whole world. So, Democrats, be careful, lest your actions arise in the future to embarrass you. We should put aside the question of partisan politics. I can not say that party politics animate men on either side of this House but, from a question or two asked here, I am afraid partisan politics do have some long, lingering influence down in some of our hearts, but on serious questions of this kind let us put them aside. [Applause.]

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN].

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, there is a high point in the life and history of every Congress. My humble opinion is that this day will be the high point in the life of this one. You are making history to-day, and I would be unfaithful to myself, unfaithful to the American people, and unfaithful to the people whom I have the honor to represent if, when called upon to speak on this occasion, I failed to speak frankly.

I have said time and again—and I say now—that this moratorium movement has behind it a scheme concocted by certain international bankers to cancel the foreign debts owing to the United States and unload that burden upon the American people in order that the bankers may collect their private loans abroad.

In the beginning, I want to refer to some statements made by the distinguished gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. RAGON] with reference to my honorable colleague, Mr. QUIN. There is not a man in Congress who more thoroughly registers the heartbeats of the American people in his attitude on public questions such as this than does PERCY QUIN, of Mississippi. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Arkansas, instead of criticizing Mr. QUIN and praising the foreign policies of the present administration, which have been the most bunglesome in the history of the Republic, might well take a lesson from that sturdy and faithful Democrat who came here to protest against the passage of this resolution which, in my opinion, is one of the most vicious measures ever brought to the floor of this House.

I wonder whether the gentleman from Arkansas fully subscribes to the foreign policy of the present administration which he so generously praises. I wonder if he remembers how the present Secretary of State got himself into a most ridiculous position as between China and Russia some time ago. I wonder if he recalls his performance with Japan the other day. I wonder if he remembers what happened in 1930, when his conduct toward the people of Brazil, at a time when they were fighting to overthrow the most corrupt régime that republic had ever had, how he came almost within a hair's breadth of plunging this Republic into a war with Brazil, which would have meant a war with all the Spanish-speaking peoples of Central and South America.

I would advise the gentleman from Arkansas to inform himself on these questions before he goes too far in his praise of the present administration, and in condemnation of my colleague for his earnest attempt to protect the American people in this matter.

The advocates of this measure ridicule our referring to the suffering people in the United States. I was before the Ways and Means Committee when the Under Secretary of the Treasury came there.

He painted a picture of conditions in Germany and said there were 3,500,000 unemployed in that country last June, when at the same moment there were more than 4,000,000 unemployed in the United States, and that number has grown to more than 7,000,000 at the present time. Why is the Treasury Department so much concerned about unemployment in Germany while blindly refusing to recognize the seriousness of our own situation?

Let us see from whom this moratorium movement came, who started it, and what forces were and are still behind it. It was not France. It was not England. It was not Italy. None of those countries asked for this moratorium. Oh.

but they tell us that it came as the result of the critical condition in Germany. The Under Secretary of the Treasury referred to the Bank of Austria. I wonder what he thinks about the banks in your States and mine which are failing and bringing wreck and ruin to our people while we quibble over trying to give these moratoriums which will not relieve the people of the United States but will impose extra burdens upon them.

They talk about conditions in Germany. I want to talk to those who have been shedding tears about the condition in Germany. I want to show you what that condition is found to be. This is the only testimony we have, this hurried hearing we had, and they are rushing in to have you vote before they even publish the results. They did not go to the bottom of this thing, as I will show before I close. Here is the condition in Germany:

Basel, Switzerland, December 17, 1931. Germany's budgetry expenses increased $925,000,000 between 1926 and 1929.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In dollars or marks?

Mr. RANKIN. In dollars. Its annual expenses, if you please, its annual budgetry expense, increased almost $1,000,000,000. Let us see what that increase is:

About $375,000,000 of this amount resulted from increases in the salaries of public servants granted in 1927.

Other items are unemployment insurance of $250,000,000. Do you know what unemployment insurance is? Page Mr. BEEDY, of Maine. That is what they call a "dole" in England. A dole in England is simply unemployment insurance, and that is what this is.

While gentlemen on your side, and some on my side, are criticizing the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] for his reference to a "dole," if you are voting to relieve Germany through this resolution, it is in order that they may continue this "dole" to the people of Germany.

One hundred and seventy-five million dollars was used, it is stated, for various purposes, and $125,000,000 extra on reparations.

There is an annual increase of $925,000,000, and you did not know that until you saw it in to-day's paper. You have not even read the hearings and can not get them, but they ask you to rush in here and vote for this resolution and tell you that Germany is unable to pay and that if we do not grant this moratorium there will be "serious consequences" there, as if we do not have "serious consequences" throughout the United States to-day.

Another thing, Mr. Chairman, they have tried in every possible way to explain away the fact that Great Britain, Italy, and France were ready to make these payments on December 15, 1931. You have a great deal of this propaganda inspired by these international bankers who are interested in this proposition, telling the American people that these countries will never pay. Why, these countries will pay every dollar they owe. Do you not know that no country is going to risk losing its trade with the United States merely to avoid the payment of these amounts? Every man who makes that statement challenges the honor of the countries involved, all of whom are on friendly terms with the United States.

I say they not only will pay, but they were ready to make these payments when they came due.

I read this statement from the front page of the Washington Post to the committee. I will read it to you and I will ask to insert it in my remarks:

The Italian ambassador, Giacomo di Martino, had called on the State Department on Saturday to announce that the Italian Government had already deposited with the fiscal agents of the Italian Government in New York the necessary funds to carry the Italian debt payments. Similar action had already been taken by Sir Ronald Lindsay, the English ambassador, and the French ambassador, Paul Claudel, who were in a quandary as to how to advise their Governments.

But they were informed by the administration that it was not necessary, and that they would not be held in default if they failed to pay.

They challenged this statement before the Ways and Means Committee, and even brought the young reporter who wrote that article and put him on the stand, and he said, "I can not reveal the source of my information, but it is correct."

They could have found out by calling a representative of either one of these embassies. The truth of the business is they had the money ready to pay, so did the other countries, but the administration turned it down, in the hope that you would vote for this resolution or that you might vote for one that would be the opening wedge for the cancellation of these foreign debts to the United States. That is what is behind it.

Oh, they say, "We are not for cancellation." If you are not for cancellation, let me ask you one thing: Why did the President of the United States ask for the re-creation of the old Debt Funding Commission? There can be but one answer, and that is, in order that they might scale down and, to that extent, cancel these foreign debts to the United States.

I defy any man in this House to tell me why he asked for the re-creation of this old Debt Funding Commission if it was not to scale down or cancel these debts. I pause for a reply. I hear none. Then why stick your heads in the sand?

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. No; I do not care to bring in the liquor question.

Mr. SCHAFER. The gentleman asked why.

Mr. RANKIN. I am sure I would not get an answer from the gentleman without a speech on prohibition, and that subject is not before the House. [Laughter.]

There is an amendment in the resolution that simply voices the sentiment of Congress that we shall never reduce or cancel any of these debts. I am largely responsible for that amendment. When that came to a vote in the committee, to show you what was behind this measure, there was only one Republican member who voted for it, and that was the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. CROWTHER]. If they did not want to cancel these debts, if they did not want to reduce or scale down these debts, then why did they object to putting it in the resolution? No; I will tell you what is behind this, gentlemen, and your people know it, whether you do or not. It is the cancellation of these debts which will mean a cost to the United States Government of $19,000,000,000, spread over a period of about 60 years.

But they say now that they have got you committed by telegram, and at this point I would like to insert the President's telegram to me, Mr. Chairman, and my reply.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. OLIVER of Alabama). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to follows:

WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, D. C., June 23, 1931.

Hon. JOHN E. RANKIN,
Tupelo, Miss.:

You no doubt have seen my statement in Sunday's press of the proposals of the American Government in respect to postponement for one year of all intergovernmental debts. Inasmuch as the proposal is, of course, contingent upon action by Congress, and, as the matter is one of national interest having no partisan character, in that light I consulted before action the Senators and Representatives of both parties present in Washington and as many as possible who were accessible in the country. This list of generous support from Members was shown in the public statement referred to above. I regret that difficulties of communication rendered it impossible to contact with all Members of the Senate and House. I do not wish to press any Member for reply as to his views if he prefers not to give them at this time, yet, if you are favorable to the proposal in the first paragraph of the statement above mentioned, it would undoubtedly be helpful to the general situation if you could inform me thereof.

HERBERT HOOVER.

To that telegram I replied:

TUPELO, MISS.

Hon. HERBERT HOOVER,
President of the United States:

Your telegram relative to the postponement for one year of payment on foreign debts to America was delivered to me on my return from Pennsylvania, and in reply thereto I desire to say that I can not hastily commit myself to the support of this proposition in the form indicated. In my opinion it would merely divert these payments from the Federal Treasury in order to apply them to the interest on private loans that have been made in Europe since the war by certain large financial interests in the United States. While it might seem to do so temporarily, it would not contribute to the permanent solution of our difficulties. It seems to me that before Congress commits itself to this policy it might be well to secure the cooperation of these large financial interests and let them also agree to a moratorium in order that this entire burden may not be passed on to the American people. In my honest opinion, Mr. President, if this movement is consummated it will simply be the beginning of the cancellation of these foreign debts. To this I can never agree. I know, and you know, that those large financial interests that have extensive loans in Europe are anxious to get the foreign debts to the United States canceled, in order to strengthen their own securities. Before we take a step that undoubtedly will mean ultimate cancellation of these debts, there should be some understanding on the subject of a reduction of armaments. Why pass this burden back to the masses of the American people to help foreign countries maintain enormous military establishments in times of peace? Again permit me to say that before Congress agrees to this moratorium it would be well to couple with it a moratorium on tariffs and wipe out, at least for the time being, those international barriers that have paralyzed world commerce, stagnated world trade, and produced the unprecedented depression in which we find ourselves. In my humble opinion it would be useless to cancel these foreign debts, in order to give a temporary and unnatural impetus to business, without at the same time removing the causes that have produced the demoralized condition which now prevails, to say nothing of the injustice of ultimately loading this entire burden on to the great masses of American people.

J. E. RANKIN, M. C.

Mr. RANKIN. I would like also to insert in the RECORD this table from the newspapers showing the amount spent on armament by these various countries and the amount of their payments to us. I make this request, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SCHAFER. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. RANKIN. I withdraw the request. This is one time I am not going to be sandbagged into any discussion of the liquor question by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. Chairman, I say the men who answered this telegram are not bound, and I would like for you Democrats to listen to this. You are going to have to answer on your own responsibility. Do not deceive yourselves. This will be an issue in every congressional district in the United States next year, both in the primary and in the general election. The American people are not going to see you, under the pressure of Wall Street, vote their money away to foreign countries under the condition that this country is in without a solemn protest that you will never live to forget.

In the President's telegram to me he asked that there be a moratorium on all intergovernmental debts; yet in the agreement with France of July 6 she refused to give a moratorium on the unconditional reparations from Germany.

When you signed that telegram, did you agree for that modification? Is it possible that you agreed to this arrangement of which you had never heard?

If so, you are bound; if not, you are not bound. On June 20 he made no mention of the fact that there were seven or eight of those countries to whom Germany did not owe a nickel, but to my surprise the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] said a while ago that he understood that there was an understanding that they should grant a moratorium to the people who owed them.

That is the first time I ever heard of that proposition. They were new countries. They have made no loans, and had not had an opportunity to get into debt to anybody but us. [Laughter.] Did your telegram bind you to give them a moratorium? A majority of you did not know that they were involved.

Another thing, it has been said for 10 years that we were never to mix reparations with these foreign debts. But by this measure we step into the breach and take the burden of paying the reparations growing out of the war.

Did you vote for that when you signed the telegram, you gentlemen who legislate by telegram? If so, then you are bound. You can go back and say to the people, "Of course, I knew what I was doing; I am for mixing reparations with war debts—and in having our people pay both of them."

Another thing they did not tell you. In the telegram the President sent me he did not say anything about extending this moratorium for 10 years, but only to extend it 1 year. Now you are asked to extend it for 10 years. The telegram I had said nothing about reviving the old Debt Funding Commission.

If it had, it could have been for only one thing, and that would be the reduction or cancellation of these debts and unloading them onto the American people.

They talk about conditions in Germany. Germany does not owe us this money. It is France and Italy and England and Belgium and these other countries involved. They have the money to pay. France is in better condition to-day than we are, especially when compared with their condition and ours 10 years ago.

Every debtor country in Europe had the money to pay us, and every one of them would have paid it had it not been for this pell-mell rush in here in response to the excitement at the White House, trying to sandbag you into giving this moratorium before you had time to investigate it.

Before the Ways and Means Committee they brought a representative of J. P. Morgan & Co., a young fellow, and put him on the stand.

Some of them were so afraid that we would ask him an embarrassing question that I never did get him to answer the question whether or not the financial relations of that bank to England, France, and Italy were such that if they had been notified to make these payments they would have done so. As a matter of fact, that is what would have happened, and if it had not been for the Secretary of State and the Under Secretary of the Treasury every dollar of this money would now be in the hands of the United States.

I know it is an unpleasant thing to make a fight at this time. I may be making a useless fight, but I am going to tell you now that I never fought a battle in all my life in which I was more seriously in earnest than I am to-day.

Do you think that under these conditions, with the financial condition of Germany having been concealed until yesterday, with the undeniable testimony brought out by the committee that they have been concealing this condition, and that they increased their internal expenses more than $900,000,000 a year—do you think with that situation, with every country that owes us a dollar ready and willing to pay, that I can vote to support what I believe to be a move to cancel these foreign debts and unload that burden on the American people when we have six or seven million of our own citizens walking the streets and tramping the highways without work?

Feeling as I do, do you suppose that I can afford to vote for this resolution to turn back $260,000,000 of our money to Europe, when there are millions of women and children in this country to-day who are suffering for want of the necessities of life? Do you suppose I can vote for that when in practically every congressional district in the United States American citizens who maintain this country in time of peace and fight its battles in time of war are having their homes sold from under them in order to meet their taxes?

Do you suppose I can vote for this resolution in order to lift that burden from the peoples of Europe and put it upon our own? Do you suppose I can vote for it when I see scattered throughout the length and breadth of this land the widows and orphans of those who fought our battles in the World War, the war out of which these international bankers made their fortunes, the war out of which these reparations grew—when I see those widows and orphans without a penny, whose husbands and fathers died as a result of their service in the war? When I see them denied one penny as a result of a presidential veto in this House, I can not, and will not, stultify myself to vote for this resolution which I honestly believe is unnecessary, which I honestly believe means the ultimate cancellation of these foreign debts and the unloading of that burden onto the already overburdened taxpayers of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the subject matter before us to-day is one about to which we could apply common sense rather than resort to oratory. I for one have the distinction, I believe, of being the only Member of Congress who was not honored by a telegraphic request for a legislative power of attorney from the President. I did not get a telegram for the simple reason that within 24 hours after the President had declared the moratorium I expressed doubt as to the validity of the President's act, and in a radio speech from WOR, New York, criticised the procedure.

I still believe, and I concede to the opposition, that there is no constitutional power vested in the Executive to make any solemn obligation of the nature of the moratorium. I can not agree with the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK] seeking to sustain as constitutional the act of the President. But, gentlemen, we are not in a court of law to-day; we are rather sitting as a court of equity and mercy. If this were purely a domestic matter, we might well resent a seeming usurpation of power—as a matter involving our relations with foreign governments. We have little choice. Repudiate the President; but to the world, perhaps, unfamiliar with our constitutional provisions, we could never be able to explain. After all, when the President spoke the people of the world had every right to assume he was talking for the American people. We have no choice in the matter other than to ratify what is now an accomplished fact. This is not the first time in the history of our country that the President has acted without the advice and consent of the legislative branch of the Government. In 1892 a similar situation came up. At the time an interesting precedent—just the reverse of the constitutional question now before us—was found back in 1864. At that time notice had been given to England that the United States desired to avail itself of a cancellation clause in the treaty of 1817 in relation to armaments on the Great Lakes, and had given six months' notice, in accordance with the provisions of that treaty, and the Senate ratified that notice. Immediately thereafter in view of changed conditions on the Great Lakes it was thought for the best interests of the United States to continue that treaty, whereupon the Secretary of State gave notice to England that this country withdrew its former notification of cancellation and indicated that notice of such withdrawal was notice of our desire to continue the treaty.

Great Britain then raised the question as to the authority of the Secretary of State and the President without the consent of the Senate. That question was definitely answered at the time by our taking the stand that the matter of procedure or authority of the President did not and could not concern a foreign government. In a memorandum submitted by the Secretary of State, Mr. Foster, to the President on December 7, 1892, referring to this incident and approving the precedent, the law does permanently establish as to the position of the United States in such a situation.

> As between the United States and Great Britain this act of withdrawal was "no less authoritative than the notification itself." Into the authority of the Secretary of State, either to give or withdraw the notice, the British Government was "incompetent to inquire"; it "could only accept and respect the withdrawal as a fact." The question of competency "being a matter of domestic administration, affecting the internal relations of the executive and legislative powers" in no wise concerned Great Britain. The raising by her of a question as to "the authority of the executive power" in the matter would have constituted "an unprecedented and inadmissible step in the international relations of governments.

We are exactly in a reverse position to-day. A solemn promise had been given to the nations of the world, although without authority; and if we now question that, we would be confronted with our stand in 1892 and in 1864. International law, as you all know, is based on precedents; and we surely would be in a most awkward position if Congress were to reverse the established custom in our relations to foreign governments. I think the opposition to this resolution has served a very useful purpose. I believe it will be many years before any Executive will take it upon himself to make any promise involving expenditures, requiring legislation, or dealing with a subject matter entirely under the control of the legislative branch of the Government without first obtaining the necessary consent or authority from Congress. It will serve another very useful purpose, because I think it will be many, many years before any Member of Congress will be so quick to answer a telegram and give the President a legislative power of attorney. In this instance many Members of this House are estopped from criticizing the President by reason of the quick and unequivocal responses sent to him in reply to his telegram.

I stated at the time and within 24 hours the law on the question as I understood it, and that under the precedents and in accordance with the limitations of our Constitution this was not a subject of treaty. There is no treaty concerned in this matter.

What is the history of our foreign loans? During the Sixty-fifth Congress, after the declaration of war, this Congress passed what is known as the first Liberty loan act. In that act we provided—> for the further and successful prosecuton of the war, the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is authorized to buy foreign securities of the nations—

with which we were then associated in the war against Germany. That is all the authority there was. Purely a legislative act, and when the Secretary of the Treasury and the President acted they acted for Congress within the limits of the specific delegated powers granted to them by the first Liberty loan act. Thereafter, the second and third Liberty loan acts reiterated that authority and increased the amounts to be purchased of those foreign securities commonly known as our foreign loans. After the war came the debt refunding act, and we gave back those securities and funded the various debts. Again, the Executive, we find, acted as a delegated agent of the legislative branch of the Government in expressing the willingness of the American Government to reduce the original debts. Then Congress created the Debt Funding Commission. Finally Congress approved the settlements made.

So, gentlemen, it is clear there is no question of any treaty or treaty-making powers involved now. The President can only act under the delegated powers given by Congress on any arrangement with foreign governments concerning loans by us to such foreign governments. That, I believe, has been made clear to the world by what has transpired in Congress during the last few days.

I feel that the nature of these loan transactions is so clear that no one will seriously continue to contend that they come within the treaty-making powers of the Constitution. But all of that is beside the question at this particular moment. A majority of the Members of the House and the Senate by their very conduct are estopped from raising the question of the President's authority at this time. I am not; but as I said before, in a matter of so great importance to the world and concerning our relations with foreign governments, I do not question it for the purpose of the consideration and the necessary passage of the resolution now before us. Ah, gentlemen, many of you have already spoken. If you stood by the President in June you can not refuse to stand by him in December. Here I have a long list of our colleagues. How easy it is to picture many a friend of ours who responded so quickly and cheerfully to the President's telegram, strutting down Main Street of his home town with an air of importance, pulling the telegram out of his pocket and with a most serious mien telling his constituents and neighbors, "I have just been consulted by the President in a most important matter—I have given the matter a great deal of thought and I am going to help the President—I have wired him to go ahead, that he can count on my support." [Applause and laughter.] Why, gentlemen, there has seldom been such a successful result of a test of applied egotistical psychology. [Applause and laughter.]

Seriously, though, no one can object, I am sure, if I should read statements made by Members of this House and the other body as quoted in dispatches from the Associated Press and carried in all of the papers in the country. Before reading these most impressive statements it is well that we be reminded that the course of action taken by the President was approved at the time by the following Senators: HENRY F. ASHURST, HIRAM BINGHAM, WILLIAM E. BORAH, JAMES F.

BYRNES, ARTHUR CAPPER, SIMEON D. FESS, DUNCAN U. FLETCHER, CARTER GLASS, WILLIAM J. HARRIS, PAT HARRISON, CORDELL HULL, WILLIAM H. KING, Dwight W. MORROW, GEORGE H. MOSES, DAVID A. REED, CLAUDE A. SWANSON, ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG, ROBERT F. WAGNER, DAVID I. WALSH, THOMAS J. WALSH, JAMES E. WATSON.

And by the following Representatives:

ISAAC BACHARACH, JOSEPH W. BYRNS, CARL R. CHINDBLOM, FRANK CROWTHER, JAMES W. COLLIER, CHARLES R. CRISP, THOMAS H. CULLEN, GEORGE P. DARROW, HARRY A. ESTEP, WILLIS C. HAWLEY, CARL E. MAPES, J. C. MCLAUGHLIN, EARL C. MICHENER, C. WILLIAM RAMSEYER, BERTRAND H. SNELL, JOHN Q. TILSON, ALLEN T. TREADWAY, and WILL R. WOOD.

I will repeat at the risk of becoming tiresome that I do not personally approve of such method of legislation. Certain that we will never have a recurrence, I feel justified in stating that it comes with bad grace at this time for any legislator to go back on the promise given the President last summer.

Now, let me read these choice quotations from our colleagues of statements made at the time that the world and the country was approving the President's act. Listen to these quick responses:

Senator HARRIS, of Georgia said:

I told President Hoover that I felt the moratorium would not only help Germany but would help our country greatly.

Representative LUDLOW:

Unhesitatingly pledge President Hoover my vote and my influence on the moratorium proposal.

Mr. BLOOM, an authority on foreign affairs:

The only safe and sound business solution.

Representative WILSON, of Louisiana:

It is the only practical thing to do.

Senator TYDINGS:

I am all for it. It is a good thing.

And then good, lovable, generous EDGAR HOWARD, of Nebraska, said:

I favor the present plan. He does not go as far as I would like to go. I favor the principle of cancellation of all war debts, provided all nations would agree to cancel all war debts due from any other nation.

Then comes Representative SHALLENBERGER, one of the most earnest legislators on the floor of this House:

The nations of Europe are staggering under the weight of war debts. Relief from this load is essential to the return of world prosperity.

IGOE, of Illinois:

The plan is a good one. I believe in it and will vote for it.

SABATH, of Illinois:

I am satisfied the proposal will be helpful and beneficial and I will give it my support.

But he adds:

I feel that immediate steps should be taken to relieve conditions in our own country.

LEONARD W. SCHUETZ, of Illinois:

I think it is a wonderful plan, but Mr. Hoover should first do something for the sufferers in this country before taking care of Europe. I will support the moratorium idea, though.

WILLIAM H. SUTPHIN, of New Jersey:

I heartily approve anything that will stimulate business. This seems a step in the right direction. I will give the plan my support.

AUGUSTINE LONERGAN, of Connecticut:

I favor a moratorium as outlined by you in Sunday's press.

Senator MARCUS A. COOLIDGE, of Massachusetts:

A very good thing. The suspension should go into effect immediately. It will help Germany materially. I do not believe in the cancellation of reparations or debts and do not think the proposed moratorium is a preliminary to cancellation.

E. E. COX, of Georgia:

If the proposal made carries with it no implication of reduction or cancellation of war debts, I will support it.

HOWARD W. SMITH, of Virginia, said the plan appears to offer—possibility of aiding in the alleviation of the present distressful economic conditions, and I am heartily in accord with any such movement.

MICHAEL K. REILLY, of Wisconsin:

If the plan is accepted it should have a good effect on the general morale of European countries and bring some direct relief by releasing funds for industrial investment.

OSCAR L. AUF DER HEIDE, of New Jersey:

The President's proposal, if agreed to by all the allied nations, will probably be effective in relieving the economic and political strain in Germany.

CHARLES R. CRISP, of Georgia, said he would support legislation for a one year's moratorium on international public debts—

If all nations involved would agree, but would not consent to reducing debts due us by foreign governments.

WILLIAM J. GRANFIELD, of Massachusetts—

There are two sides to every question * * *. If the suspension of the payment of war debts will stabilize conditions throughout the world and preserve the present German Government, by all means suspend them.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield? Will the gentleman read the names that are not on there?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I can not read what is "not there," No one could possibly frame a more impressive appeal than this—

It is just one of those cases wherein we can afford to be generous and patient, in the hope that it might preserve a part of civilization, save a republican form of government and influence such economic stability among a people, the beneficent results of which it is hoped will give impetus and confidence to the economic progress and general prosperity.

Not from a supporter of the President, not from a banker, not from a standpatter, but from one of the most brilliant aggressive Democrats in the United States, Senator PAT HARRISON of Mississippi.

Now, ladies and gentlemen, let us take the figures. We have had a great deal of figures in the last few years. It is not only the United States, after all, that is generous in this matter. Other nations have their economic troubles. Other governments are waiving payments for one year. The parliaments of France and Belgium and England, and whatever there may be of a parliament in Italy, have their budgetary troubles, and necessarily they all must have based their 1932 and 1933 budget plans on receiving fixed payments from Germany. None of the countries indebted to the United States for war loans is in as good a financial position as we are—and we are in a bad shape.

Under the reparations plan, Germany would have paid England during the period under consideration, and covered by the moratorium, $175,000,000, and England would have received about $65,000,000 from France and about $21,000,000 from Italy—a total of approximately $261,000,000. England would have paid to us only $159,000,000.

Germany would have paid to France $193,000,000 and France would have paid to us $50,000,000 and $65,000,000 to England. It is estimated that France's suspension of payments amount to a little over $75,000,000.

Germany would have paid to Belgium $30,000,000 and Belgium would have paid to us $9,000,000. Surely the suspension of $21,000,000 for one year means a good deal to a small country like Belgium.

Germany would have paid to Italy $45,000,000 and Italy would have paid to us $15,000,000 and to England $21,000,000.

So that after all, let us not assume the attitude that the United States alone is suspending payments for one year. Every one of the allied nations or nations debtor to the United States have been compelled to surrender payment of reparations during the present year.

Something has been said about France's refusal to waive payments during this period and insisting upon payments of part of the reparations. It is true in part, but let us be fair about that. France will actually receive no cash payments from Germany during the year covered by the moratorium. France did not want to lose the identity of certain particular noncancellable reparation payments, and, in order to save it, it provided that those payments would be made, but should be made to the Bank for International Credits and immediately turned back to Germany and the bonds of the German railroads taken therefor. But I submit that inasmuch as the railroads are owned by the German Government, therefore this payment back to Germany is tantamount to a waiver of all payments during the present year. France naturally has her own domestic troubles and after all that the French people have been through in the last 60 years it is not so surprising that they proceed rather cautiously and perhaps to insist on maintaining their rights.

A great deal has been insinuated and intimated and something said concerning "secret understandings" or "secret arrangements" between this country and France, or between the President and other countries. All such talk, of course, is foolish. There can be no such thing as a secret understanding or a secret arrangement or secret treaty or even a secret promise between the Government of the United States and the government of any foreign country. It is not necessary to serve notice or for Congress to declare that there can be no such thing as any secret arrangement or secret understanding. The world was given notice of that years ago. At one time, when it was rumored among the chancellories of Europe of some secret understanding between this Government and the Czar of Russia, the position of the United States was clearly stated by Mr. Bayard, the then Secretary of State, on May 5, 1885, when he declared:

> There is no secret treaty * * * between the United States and Russia, and I may well add that there are no effective secret engagements of any kind between the United States and other sovereignties, all concluded treaties becoming effective only upon the ratification and public proclamation by the President.

So I am sure there is no necessity of dwelling upon that point or attempting to answer some of the insinuations made along such lines.

We have also had a great deal of discussion about the international bankers.

Well, I hold no brief for the international bankers or for any kind of bankers; but let us be frank about this. Gentlemen, when you are criticizing bankers to-day—and they have been responsible in a large measure for the complete financial and industrial collapse under which we are suffering—you are criticizing the economic system of the day; yet when some of us criticize it we are confronted with the charge of being radicals and seeking to destroy rather than help. It can not be denied that the present economic system has completely broken down. I do not think it requires any argument any more to convince you that the entire economic system is about to collapse. Many fundamental changes and readjustments must be brought about. Germany is doing in many ways a great deal more than we are to bring about an economic readjustment. It is indeed well that we give Germany a chance to get on her feet. It is to our interest that we do so.

At one moment we hear that this moratorium is for the benefit of France; then we hear it is for the benefit of Germany. I am frank to say I believe it is for the benefit of all the countries concerned. [Applause.] The House will remember that just before the declaration of the moratorium there was a run on Austria, gentlemen, not a run on one institution, not a run on one bank or a chain of banks, but a run on a country, so much so that Austria was compelled by Government decree to close its banks and appeal to the countries of Europe for additional loans in order to save the situation. Following that run on Austria there was a run on Germany, which was followed by a run on Great Britain. Since that time 19 countries have been compelled to abandon the gold standard and go to the silver standard. The economic situation is most critical. We are in a most critical situation right in our own country.

I believe it was the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SANDERS] who stated that the House was not informed, that we knew nothing about this. I can not speak for the House, but I can speak for a small group of serious-minded, progressive legislators who have given this matter a great deal of study. The small Progressive group of the House knew this matter was coming before us. We read every particle of documentary evidence we could get our hands on. We invited sponsors of the opposition to come before our group to make statements and argue their side of the question. We invited a well-informed gentleman in support of this question, and we listened to him for two hours and a half. The Progressive group in this House is informed. I do not know how they will vote, because it is one of the fundamental principles of the Progressives that each Member votes according to his own conscience and judgment and not en bloc, but I can say that no matter how they vote they at least have been informed on this question and have as much information as anyone in the country. So I resent the statement made this afternoon that Members of the House are uninformed on the question and have had no opportunity of getting the facts. Here is one group of Members that has obtained the facts.

Now, gentlemen, of course we are going to have the problem of our own domestic economic collapse before us. I will concede that we are in bad shape industrially, commercially, financially, and even socially. I am sure there will be a sharp division in this House when some constructive measure comes before us for consideration. I want to submit to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] that it is no proof of the prosperity of a country to say that Germany had to appropriate an increase of $250,000,000 this year to take care of the unemployed people. Germany is crushed. There is no question about that, and no better proof than the number of unemployed referred to by the gentleman from Mississippi.

Let us now look to the political side of this question.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. What about appropriating $350,000,000 a year to raise Government salaries?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am not sure of the accuracy of that figure and its classification.

Mr. RANKIN. The statement was that they raised Government salaries $375,000,000 that year.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. An increase was necessary, due to the depreciated value of their currency and, of course, they had to make good for it. Depreciation of currency is also no indication of prosperity.

Gentlemen, let me point out the political situation. Let us be fair about this thing. There is a political party in Germany right now that is hoping that this Congress turns down this moratorium. Why? Because then the Hitlerites will move in and take control of the government. Just as sure as day follows night if Hitler gets into power, then within six months we will have a Hohenzollern at the head of the German Government. I, for one—and I believe I speak the sentiments of the 2,000,000 boys who went overseas—do not want to see a Hohenzollern back on the throne of Germany. [Applause.] Either that—followed by the restoration of the Hapsburg dynasty—or chaos and uncertainty. We must not give the Royalists of Germany and Austria an opportunity to again disturb the peace of the world.

Now, gentlemen, let me read a part of a message that was most unusual in any war message read at any time by any head of any nation. I was a young Member of the Sixty-fifth Congress when war was declared. I remember vividly this part of the message delivered by President Wilson, which created a new thought in international relations. It not only electrified this country but compelled the whole world to listen and admire this great man.

This is what President Wilson said in his war message referring to the Hohenzollern dynasty and distinguishing it from the German people:

> We are now about to accept the gage of battle with this natural foe to liberty and shall, if necessary, spend the whole force of the Nation to check and nullify its pretensions and its power. We are glad now that we see the facts with no veil of false pretense about them, to fight thus for the ultimate peace of the world and for the liberation of its peoples, the German people included.

[Applause.]

Now, gentlemen, listen to this:

We are, let me say again, the sincere friends of the German people, and shall desire nothing so much as the early reestablishment of intimate relations of mutual advantage between us—however hard it may be for them, for the time being, to believe that this is spoken from our hearts. We have borne with their present government through all these bitter months because of that friendship—exercising a patience and a forbearance which would otherwise have been impossible. We shall, happily, still have an opportunity to prove that friendship in our daily attitude and actions toward the millions of men and women of German birth.

[Applause.]

And this is the first opportunity, gentlemen, to make good in a practical, material, tangible way, the sacred promise made by President Wilson to the people of Germany at the time he was compelled to declare war against their government.

I do not know how much good the moratorium will do, but I do know that Congress will do irreparable damage if it is not ratified at this time. A chance must be given the German people to save their form of government, to save their republic, and also give notice to the German people that we are going to make good the promise made by the President of the United States when he declared war against the Hohenzollern dynasty. Under the circumstances I for one am not willing that the American Congress should plead ultra vires on a solemn promise made by the President of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN].

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, I observe by articles appearing in the public press of yesterday afternoon and this morning, published quite generally in the newspapers throughout the country, that I have been singled out as a victim of punitive measures to be administered to me by my Republican colleagues of Pennsylvania in the House and Senate of the United States.

I have serious objection to being tried in this ex parte manner and having an ex parte judgment rendered against me by this self-constituted board of inquiry concerning utterances made by me on the floor of this House. Whatever I said on the floor of the House upon any subject, I said in the performance of what I conceive to be my full duty in giving to the Members of the House such information as I had concerning matters then pending before the House, in order that they might have the same opportunity of considering and weighing the evidence that I had before voting upon such measures.

I submitted documents and was prepared to submit further documents were I permitted, but, unfortunately, on account of the insistence of the time restrictions I could not submit the other documents, all of which were of evidential value in determining the weight to be accredited to any remarks I was then making.

I was appearing in the performance of my official duty, as it is the duty of every Member in this House to give such information as he may have acquired to the House on any matter pending before the House that he believes will be to the best interests of his constituents and his country.

The truth of the allegations made by me in the speech that I made on the floor of this House seems to be the subject of inquiry of this cabal of my State associates in the Congress of the United States. If, in the wisdom of this House, they desire to further consider this matter, I shall hold myself in readiness to furnish such additional information as I may have to offer, supplementary thereto, and all referred to therein.

Now, I want to discuss for a moment some phases of the bill that is now before us. I appeared before the Ways and Means Committee the other day and pointed out two or three things in connection with this bill. I have repeatedly been calling the attention of the Members here to one phase of this particular bill which, it seems to me, it is important for us to consider. I refer now to the fact that the ratification of this moratorium affects seriously the Young plan, in that it opens up the debt question.

I would also like to call the attention of the House to the fact that after the moratorium declaration, France, after several days of consideration, objected to that declaration and refused to concur. France finally entered into an agreement known as the Franco-American agreement, in which France changed completely the question of the moratorium. The subsequent visit to this country of Premier Laval, of France, brought back the Young plan into operation, which had been seriously affected by the moratorium, and France was assured, as a result of the Laval conference, if we can believe the reports of the French House of Deputies, that the United States was willing that France should deal with Germany.

Now, I want to call the particular attention of the House to the fact that the Franco-American agreement was an additional agreement, and I want to call again to the attention of the House, as I did to the Ways and Means Committee, the London protocol, and I want to state to you men here, many of you are lawyers—I am not—that there is a treaty involved in this transaction, and it is a matter for the United States Senate to handle.

There are conditions set forth in that treaty which have to do with international finance. There are matters in that treaty which affect international finance seriously.

I also want to call your attention to the fact that in the Young plan there were provisions set up whereby Germany was given a course to pursue in case she found herself unable to pay. The machinery was set up and was completely set up, so that if Germany found she could not pay her course was clear, and that course was that she should apply to the Bank for International Settlements for relief.

For some reason or other Germany did not see fit to operate under the Young plan. I have just been wondering, from the reports that are emanating from Basel, Switzerland, and from Berlin in the last few days, referred to by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] and published in all the papers, where, under the terms of the Young plan, under which Germany is now operating, and you must understand in this connection that Germany is operating under the Young plan and not under the Hoover moratorium. Germany was given, since the Hoover-Laval conference, the right to a 2-year moratorium by asking for it, under the Young plan, through the Bank for International Settlements. The Bank for International Settlements was directed to operate under the Young plan and set up a committee to study Germany's capacity to pay; but, as I say, for some reason they did not want to do this.

Now, as a result of what has happened since the Hoover-Laval conference, Germany has been told, not only by France but by the international bankers of New York, speaking for financial America, that they expected her to ask for a moratorium under the Young plan, as France was asking.

This committee has been working, and alongside the committee has been a committee representing the international bankers who have been responsible for the flotation in the United States of probably between seven and eight billion dollars' worth of German bonds and what is now known to be two billion and a half dollars of acceptance credits.

Why did Germany refrain from acting under the moratorium clause until she was forced to do so after the Hoover-Laval conference? It seems to me that these financial and economic committees which have been investigating her capacity to pay have discovered the reason why Germany did not operate under the Young plan. They would know that Germany was holding out. We have proof of that by the Wiggin report of last summer, which estimated $1,250,000,000 of acceptance credit, which was underestimated by 50 per cent.

The Germans apparently wanted to operate under some plan where their financial situation would not be gone into so carefully. The Wiggin report must have accepted the Reich's figures without a careful check.

The present committee, composed and dominated largely by England and France, have been watching the financial operations of Germany closely. They are in a position to understand the peculiar make-up of the minds of their neighbors.

I have referred to the fact that there was nothing new or pressing about this particular moratorium. I have pointed out the fact that it was known in the United States as long ago as the fall of 1930.

In that connection I want to call attention to a visit in the United States of a very important German, and I want to refer to an article which is reported in the Baltimore Sun—all the papers at that time had this—under date of October 20, 1930.

This article is written by Drew Pearson, the Washington Bureau, Baltimore Sun. It says:

MORATORIUM ON ALLIED DEBTS TO UNITED STATES UNOFFICIALLY STUDIED—NEW YORK FEDERAL RESERVE BANK HEAD DRAFTING TENTATIVE PLAN IN VIEW OF POSSIBILITY GERMANY MAY DEFAULT ON REPARATIONS

Dr. Hjalmar Schacht, the man who stabilized the German mark, has placed an extremely frank and extremely gloomy picture of Germany's economic plight before the highest officials of the Hoover administration during the week-end.

Coincident with this it was learned to-day that George Harrison, governor of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, has been working on tentative plans for a moratorium on allied debt payments to the United States in case Germany declares a moratorium on her Young plan payments to the Allies.

Mr. Harrison was in the Capital yesterday and to-day and had luncheon yesterday with Doctor Schacht at the home of the Secretary of State Stimson.

SUGGESTED DEBT REVISION

Because of this fact Germany made informal suggestions to Great Britain as early as last summer that a campaign be started for the scaling down of allied debt payments to the United States.

The officials with whom Doctor Schacht conferred over the week-end include President Hoover, whom he saw this morning; Secretary of the Treasury Mellon, whom he saw both yesterday and to-day; Eugene Meyer, chairman of the Federal Reserve Board; Joseph P. Cotton, Under Secretary of State; George Harrison; and Secretary of State Stimson.

In his conversations with some of these Doctor Schacht went into the German situation very thoroughly and was extremely frank.

I want to point out to you and call to your attention the fact that the ratification of the moratorium opens up the debt-settlement plan. The position of this administration has been reiterated by very high authorities that there was no connection between the war debts and reparations.

In the remarks I made the other day I referred to an editorial appearing in the Hearst papers to the effect that a plan had been submitted to Mr. Hearst in the fall of 1930.

Mr. RANKIN. What is the date of the paper that the gentleman is reading from?

Mr. McFADDEN. October 20, 1930.

Mr. BEEDY. A plan for what?

Mr. McFADDEN. A plan for the moratorium, as I just stated, reading from the article.

Mr. BEEDY. But the article does not so state. As the gentleman quoted it, it was a plan for debt revision.

Mr. McFADDEN. I shall put the article in the RECORD so that it can be seen for itself.

Mr. BEEDY. The gentleman inserted it in his original speech, and I called attention to it in my reply, and the gentleman will find that the language of the article stated that the plan submitted at that time was for debt revision and the word "moratorium" was not used.

Mr. McFADDEN. I have other articles here where the word "moratorium" was used. I think it is immaterial here, and I think the gentleman will appreciate that fact before I finish.

Mr. RANKIN. And Congress was in session after that.

Mr. McFADDEN. Oh, yes; Congress was in session until the 4th of March, 1931.

Mr. RANKIN. And it was never brought to the attention of Congress by the Executive.

Mr. McFADDEN. It was not at that time. I have several articles here covering the question of Dr. Hjalmer Schacht. In respect to Doctor Schacht's visit, I might say that I was advised of his contemplated arrival and purpose. I was told that Doctor Schacht, because of some activities of mine in connection with war debts and reparations and some speeches that I had made, desired to see me in regard to the question of a moratorium. A friend of his came to me and asked me if I would see him. He apparently obtained my views as regards this particular matter, and I did not have the pleasure of seeing Doctor Schacht on his visit here.

I want now to call attention to the correspondence appearing in the Washington Herald of December 17, 1931, being a copy of a letter addressed by Jules Bache, of the firm of J. S. Bache & Co., members of the New York Stock Exchange, of New York City, which firm is probably the second largest stock-exchange house in the city of New York. The letter is dated November 6, 1930. Note the dates in regard to Doctor Schacht's visit, which I have just referred to here, and this letter. Permit me to say also that Mr. Bache, besides being a member of the stock exchange, is an international financier, closely associated with the group of international financiers who have floated these large issues of German securities in the United States. His letter addressed to Mr. Hearst is as follows:

LETTER FROM MR. BACHE TO MR. HEARST

42 BROADWAY, NEW YORK, October 21, 1930.

WILLIAM RANDOLPH HEARST, Esq.,
San Simeon Ranch, Calif.

MY DEAR MR. HEARST: Sometime ago at the request of some friends I drew up a memorandum of some views in regard to German reparations—which are not novel—with a view that an intensive campaign would be necessary in this country in order to influence the Washington atmosphere and educate the man in the street, realizing that any such ideas if fostered by Wall Street interests would be thought to be based on a desire of the banking interests to make their loans in Germany better and would prejudice political thought.

There is no such idea in my mind, but I am guided entirely by a desire to help the general depressed situation. I do not know whether your ideas coincide with mine, but I can not conceive of any better way of awakening public interest in this country in any such movement, as I am recommending, than to have it supported by the Hearst publications.

In addressing you I am reminded of the magnificent manner in which you took up the idea of the sales tax when I first discussed it with you, and I am wondering whether you are sufficiently interested in this subject to consider seriously the idea of having your publications lead in this matter.

Any such move by the United States can not help but elicit an enthusiastic reception by the nations interested, and while on the face of the proposition, it would appear as though we were making a present of part of our legitimate war loans, I am convinced that we are never going to be able to collect all of these war loans, and in fact I am inclined to think that we are likely to get a great deal more of our money back by this method than in any other way.

Asking your indulgence for this communication, and with cordial greetings, believe me

INCLOSURE IN MR. BACHE'S LETTER

OCTOBER 1, 1930.

It seems to me that the United States has in its power by prompt action to change the entire current of sentiment throughout the world and that at practically no cost to itself, but with the possibility of enormous indirect gain in the benefit that will accrue to the income of its citizens and its business community, by lifting the cloud of depression now weighing so heavily on the business world.

Doctor Schacht, since his arrival in this country, has been outspoken in expressing his unofficial opinion that it is only a question of time when Germany will be compelled to ask the Allies for a moratorium on its reparation payments. Any economist who will carefully review the situation and inform himself of the condition of German finances, will concur with Doctor Schacht. In fact, figures show that Germany has never paid any reparations in excess of the actual money loaned to it by other nations. It has no resources of its own out of which to pay these reparations, which in the final analysis can only be paid out of an export balance, which Germany has not yet acquired to any extent.

The day that Germany ceases the payment of reparations the Allies, with the exception of England, which have contracts under the war loans to pay money to the United States will cease payment under those contracts, and we have no way to enforce payment thereunder. It seems, therefore, patent that beyond the English payments we have little to hope for from the German reparations once payment stops. It is unlikely that France will endeavor to compel payment by force, since a renewed invasion of Germany by French troops would so demoralize the German situation as to make payments still more hopeless.

I have, therefore, arrived at the conclusion that if the United States were promptly to call a conference of the Allies represented in Paris when the Young plan was evolved and offer to its debtors, including England, to reduce their payments in proportion to each of their debtor's share in the conditional payments contemplated by the Young plan, on condition that these debtors cancel those conditional payments, the very fact that Germany would thus be relieved of one-third of the amount fixed as indemnity under the Young plan would so improve the morale of the German nation, as well as its credit, that it would make it quite probable that the unconditional payments could be made, and the United States would thus recover far more from these war loans than under present conditions it is ever likely to receive.

The effect of the announcement of such a program would be so inspiring as to immediately dissipate the heavy clouds hanging over the financial future of the world. In fact, it would bring moneys to the United States which personally I am convinced it would otherwise never receive. It would so immeasurably improve the standing of the United States in the community of nations that such action by us would become an asset and remove a liability.

The unconditional payments agreed upon in the Young plan are $163,000,000. The conditional payments amount to $314,900,000. It is these latter, which at best will never be collected, which I am asking the United States to lose.

I appreciate that politically this program is seemingly impossible of fruition. So did the repeal of the Volstead Act appear less than 12 months ago. There is only one way by which such a program could become successful. It would be by the formation of a group of great industrialists, if possible headed by Mr. Owen D. Young, the expenses of which everyone would gladly contribute, to educate the voting public of the United States into a realization that at best the man in the street has little interest in the sums which the United States might recover from these German indemnities.

Right there I desire to call the attention of the House to the close relationship which big business not only in the United States but big business in Germany has; how closely it is related to the international financial group, which I am referring to in this debate. [Continuing reading:]

Since the great mass of the people do not pay taxes, whereas every factor in our community is interested in securing a better price for what he has to sell, whether commodity or labor, which would surely result in the improvement of the world's status. This movement must come from the great industrialists, whose following can be counted in the number of voters they employ.

This is a very practical letter to the Members of Congress as to how legislation is promoted by the interests that want to put something across. [Continuing reading:]

It can not come from the bankers, who would be accused of trying to make their loans good. It is a movement worthy of great leaders. Once started, it is bound to succeed.

I want to call attention to the fact that the international banking group, and this big international industrial group, have been carrying on a campaign intensively for the purpose of reducing and canceling these debts.

The announcement of the formation of such a committee would immediately start to improve world sentiment.

I am not going to read Mr. Hearst's reply, but I will ask unanimous consent that it be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

LETTER TO MR. BACHE FROM MR. HEARST

NOVEMBER 6, 1930

MY DEAR MR. BACHE: I advocate the sales tax because I believe in it. I can not advocate your present plan of the United States canceling any more of the debts of the Allies for the simple reason that I do not believe in the plan.

I think the United States has already canceled too much of the debts owed to us by the Allies. My plan would be to insist upon the Allies paying their obligations and to deprive any country that would not pay its obligations of the favored-nation privileges.

I quite agree with you that politically your program is impossible of fruition, but I do not see any analogy between your plan of cancelling the debts of the Allies to the United States and the repeal of the Volstead Act.

The repeal of the Volstead Act did not seem at all impossible of accomplishment to those of us who were advocating the repeal. We felt that it ought to be accomplished, could be accomplished, and would be accomplished.

In regard to the further canceling of the debts to America by the Allies, about nine-tenths of the people of the United States feel that a proposition of that kind as an American measure can not be accomplished, should not be accomplished, and will not be accomplished.

I think the same banking policy should be followed toward nations as is followed toward individuals; and from what I know of banks and bankers, they do not, as a rule, cancel their loans to people who are able to pay, but unwilling to pay. The Allies are able to pay the United States and are merely unwilling to pay.

The ability of the Allies to pay does not depend on the German indemnity. The German indemnity should of course be reduced by the Allies, but not by us, who have neither received nor demanded indemnity from Germany.

Moreover, the territorial question is just as important as the financial question in dealing with the iniquities of the Versailles treaty—more important in fact. The plan of France was to crush Germany by dismemberment as well as by an impossible indemnity.

If America gets into the question of rectifying the iniquities and injustices of the Versailles treaty, we are likely to get into a vast amount of trouble and probably be involved in the war, which is almost sure to come as a result of that treaty.

My opinion, Mr. Bache, is that we are out of those complications and ought to stay out. We have asked for no direct indemnity from Germany. We have asked for only part payment of the debts which the Allies owe us.

The whole situation has been settled on this basis, and the only advantage that we get out of the situation is that it has been settled.

I not only do not intend to advocate any further reductions in the debts the Allies owe this country but I will certainly vigorously oppose any such proposal.

Of course you realize perfectly that there is nothing personal in my attitude. I would be very pleased to do anything to oblige you if it did not involve a principle which I can not compromise.

Sincerely,

W. R. HEARST.

Mr. McFADDEN. I also want to call the attention of the House at this time to the struggle of these committees—the bankers' committee and the Young committee—that are dealing with Germany's capacity to pay. I want to make as clear as I can to you the fact that these international bankers are asking priority over the reparation debts which are owed to the Allies, principally to France. I also want to emphasize the fact that the Germans have agreed with these international bankers to give them a preference on their private debts. I also want to call attention to the fact that between the time Mr. Wiggin came back from abroad, in which he made his first report, that he and his New York committee of bankers have been very active in promoting a proper settlement that would inure to the benefit and protection of these private debts. They have evidenced interest, and they are on record in favor of the reduction and cancellation of German reparation obligations.

I want to call your attention to a statement that was left with the State Department on December 10. I am quoting now from the Financial Chronicle of New York under date of December 12, 1931. This article appears at page 3891, and the heading is as follows:

FRENCH GOVERNMENT'S MEMORANDUM TO STATE DEPARTMENT ON REPARATIONS

Associated Press dispatches from Washington on December 10 reported that the French Government had formally notified the United States of its position that reparation revision must be accompanied by a comparative scaling down on war debts.

The dispatch added: "Ambassador Claudel, of France, on instructions of the Paris Government, notified Secretary Stimson of the French attitude."

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] 10 additional minutes.

Mr. McFADDEN (reading):

It was understood that French commissions in other interested countries were also instructed to advise nations to which they were accredited of the French position.

In the New York Tribune, under the same date, December 10, 1931, appears the following:

William R. Castle, jr., Under Secretary of State, confirmed to-day the report that Paul Claudel, French ambassador, transmitted the views of the French Government on reparations to Henry L. Stimson, Secretary of State, yesterday. Mr. Claudel explained these views orally and then left a memorandum summarizing his conversation.

Later on it says:

Mr. Castle said he had read of the suggestion of J. Ramsay MacDonald, British Prime Minister, for a conference on economic conditions;

And it was informally placed before him.

It also says:

The French Government also advanced the view that any readjustment of reparations would have to be accompanied by a general rearrangement of the intergovernmental debts, which means the war debts owed to the United States.

I want to call your attention to a clause in the Young plan, inserted by France, not agreed to by the United States, but notice of which was given to the United States at the time of the signing of the Young plan. This stipulation provided, not in these words, but in substance to the effect that any lowering of German reparation payments would result in a like reduction of the debts owed to the United States by France. This is the reaffirmation on December 10, which the French Republic has served through their minister on the State Department of the United States.

Yesterday, when this came to my attention, I took occasion to call Mr. William R. Castle, jr., of the State Department, on the telephone, and I read to him extracts of this article, and I asked him whether or not Mr. Claudel, on behalf of the French Republic, had left that notice with the State Department. He told me they had. I said, "Did Mr. Stimson, in his appearance before the Ways and Means Committee, present that information?" He said, "No." I said, "Why not?" He told me that it was a communication from a foreign government, and we had no right to present it. I called on my colleague, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, then in executive session, and repeated to him what I have repeated to you here, and with all of the emphasis that I possessed, I insisted that they call Mr. Castle in executive session and get that statement.

I do not know whether they got it or not. I hope they did, and I hope they gave proper and careful consideration to it, because that is their position.

I want to repeat in closing that when this moratorium is passed you are changing the Young plan. You are reversing the former opinion of all the administrations that have dealt with this debt plan, and you are opening up to a future conference the question of governmental debts owed the United States as well as reparations.

Mr. BEEDY. Will the gentleman yield to a question for information?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BEEDY. The gentleman has been discussing the question of debt revision or the cancellation of debts, which is one issue. Now, do I understand that the gentleman is opposed to the proposed moratorium, namely, the delay of a year in the payment of war debts? Am I correct in my understanding?

Mr. McFADDEN. I am opposed to this moratorium because it opens up the whole question of war debts and reparations.

Mr. BEEDY. That is the gentleman's opinion, but the gentleman is opposed to a moratorium for a year and he has been consistent in that attitude, has he not?

Mr. McFADDEN. Because of the fact that Germany had a legal method under international law, which for some reason she saw fit not to exercise but which she has been forced to exercise now, and the committees are finding out the condition of Germany, and I am beginning to believe that we should not be aiding Germany in avoiding the just obligations she has entered into under an international agreement. [Applause.]

Mr. BEEDY. And in the gentleman's opposition to a moratorium he stands to-day just where he has stood for two years; is that true?

Mr. McFADDEN. Oh, no.

Mr. BEEDY. Has the gentleman changed his mind about it?

Mr. McFADDEN. I have learned a lot in two years. I have learned a lot in the last two weeks and I am learning every day.

Mr. BEEDY. Has the gentleman changed his mind about the desirability of a moratorium at any time?

Mr. McFADDEN. I think I have answered the gentleman on that. I am opposed to a moratorium, if the gentleman wants to know; yes.

Mr. BEEDY. Has the gentleman been opposed to it consistently?

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BEEDY. The gentleman yielded to me, and I think I am entitled to an answer.

Mr. McFADDEN. I said I have learned a lot about this in the last two or three weeks. I suppose the gentleman is referring to an interview which perhaps I gave out some time ago in New York.

Mr. BEEDY. A year ago the gentleman announced that he favored a moratorium.

Mr. McFADDEN. But conditions have completely changed.

Mr. BEEDY. How?

Mr. McFADDEN. I have been reciting to you what kind of methods have been taken to bring about this moratorium, and I have learned more than I knew a year ago about this whole subject.

Mr. BEEDY. Are we not in more dire straits, Germany included, than we were in the fall of 1930?

Mr. McFADDEN. I think it is due largely to our intermeddling in this whole international situation. [Applause.] And let me say this: That this means also that we are going to be called into conference at a round table, on one side of which will sit Uncle Sam and on the other side of the table are going to sit the countries who owe us, and they are determined that these debts shall be reduced or canceled. It means this: That these international bankers in order to protect their situation—and we have evidence of it in all the reports that come along—are planning now to organize international financial institutions comparable to those which are being organized or proposed to be organized here, for the purpose of taking bad debts out of one pocket and putting them into another, and then tying them up with a blue ribbon and selling them to the innocent public as something else when, as a matter of fact, they are nothing but bad debts.

Now, I say the quicker we get out of Europe and attend to the economic and financial conditions of this country the better. I say, also, that the finest and best thing that can be said by this Congress would be to serve notice on these international bankers that they must turn their backs on Europe and come back here and help us out of this disastrous economic and financial condition which they have brought about. [Applause.] I would also challenge the great industrial leaders of this country, like Owen D. Young and the heads of other big industrial institutions much in the same manner. I would say, "Gentlemen, we have confidence in your ability and your integrity, but you have been paying too much attention to international operations. You have brought about great unemployment in the United States; you have upset the whole economic condition of your country. Come back here and attend to the business of this country, in which you are engaged as leaders, and the Congress of the United States will support you to the limit, but when, by your actions and your operations, and through the sale of your securities, and through the use of the credit of the Federal reserve system you are depriving our people of their savings, their funds, and their right to do business, you are wrong."

Why, gentlemen, you would not stand for it one moment if you knew that international trade transactions were using the credit of the Federal reserve system at current, prevailing Federal reserve rates when the people of the United States can not get access to the Federal reserve system at anything but exceptionally high rates. I say it is time we began to inventory the situation and find out where we are going.

Gentlemen, I have no sinister motives in what I am trying to do. What I am trying to do here is to do that which is best for the American people. [Applause.] Anyone who challenges that right I defy.

Mr. GOLDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. I yield the gentleman from Pennsylvania 10 additional minutes.

Mr. McFADDEN. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GOLDER. I desire to make a statement in justice to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN]. The newspapers have carried a story to the effect that the gentleman from Pennsylvania has been repudiated by his colleagues from that State. I desire to state that while the gentleman's colleagues from Pennsylvania have disagreed with the expressions of our colleague relating to the President of the United States, I believe there is not a member of our delegation who has the affection or the respect of his colleagues to a greater extent than my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN].

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order I yielded to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN].

Mr. GOLDER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania yielded to me, and I felt, in justice to him, that it ought to be understood by his other colleagues in this House that I, at least, as his colleague from Pennsylvania, have the same regard and respect for his ability and his courage that I had three days ago, though disagreeing entirely with his references to our President. [Applause.]

Mr. McFADDEN. Gentlemen, I have been seriously criticized here, and, in addition to what I have already said, I have heard the lip-to-ear conversation that has been going on around this House. I have heard all kinds of stories issued for the purpose of discrediting me. I am not on trial here, gentlemen. I am ready to answer any questions, and I am surprised that my colleagues here would listen, without even discussing these matters with me in order to get the facts. It is regrettable.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman in his speech stresses the fact that Germany did not apply for a moratorium, under the Young plan, as it might have done. I wish to ask the gentleman whether or not under the terms of her agreement Germany could only ask for a moratorium of the conditional payments and not the unconditional payments, and is it not a fact that France refused to accede to the position of the President in granting a complete moratorium, and that prevented, as a psychological matter, a revival of business in general?

Mr. McFADDEN. My answer to the question is this: Since the visit of the French Premier to Washington, Germany has gone under the Young plan and has asked for this relief as the right and proper and orderly way to proceed.

Mr. STAFFORD. But under the Young plan——

Mr. McFADDEN. I do not yield any further. I think I have answered the question.

I do not care to use any more time except to say this: I have here excerpts, which I have had translated in my office, from the debates of the French Chamber of Deputies pertaining to this subject, which are material to this issue, and I am going to ask unanimous consent that they may be placed in the RECORD. I want to direct the attention of every Member of the House to the debates which have taken place in the French House of Deputies, and I, therefore, ask unanimous consent to insert this in to-day's RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman put in the original text also?

Mr. McFADDEN. I do not know that I have that now. I got them from the Library.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Is the original text in the Library?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following discussion of an interpellation on the ministerial reply to the proposals of President Hoover, also extracts from the Official Journal of the French Republic of June 26, 1931, concerning the Hoover proposal:

The PRESIDENT. I remind the Senate that M. Lémery has filed a request for interpellation on the reply which the Government made to the proposal of President Hoover relative to the Young plan and that it was decided that this interpellation should be discussed immediately after the two credit projects.

M. Lémery has the floor in order to develop his interpellation.

M. LÉMERY. Gentlemen, in ascending this tribune, I can not help being struck by the resemblance of atmosphere between this session and that of the 25th of July, 1929. As to-day the French Senate was deliberating in haste, with its eyes fixed on a due date. If we had not ratified the Mellon-Berenger accords before the 1st of August, 1929, the Government of the United States had warned us that it would require immediately the payment of the stocks, or 10 milliards, and that it would present, on their due date, the certificates of debt which it held in its hands.

In vain, still weakened by the prodigious effort which we had completed to put our finances in order, conscious of the danger there was in ratifying the accord on the debts, when the Young plan was not even approved, did we ask the Government of the United States to wait a few months to exact its credit? The Secretary of State answered us that the dispositions established could not be modified save by law, that the Congress had just left for vacation; we would have to submit or suffer execution; we had only a few hours in which to choose.

To-day, if we kept to the terms which the American Under Secretary of State, Mr. Castle, has employed, it would be necessary for us to accept the offer of President Hoover before the 1st of July.

Little was wanting, indeed, that the French Senate should not even have been able to manifest its opinion concerning the reply made by the French Government to the American proposal. It is necessary to felicitate the President of the Council for having understood that, since President Hoover believed it useful to state in his note that 22 American Senators, out of 91, approved of his initiative, it was not improper for him to concern himself with the sentiments of the French senators. [Very good! from the center and on the right.]

Gentlemen, the precipitation with which this negotiation has been entered upon in consequence of telegrams, in consequence of proceedings about which we are not yet clear, the effect of surprise which has accompanied the offer of President Hoover, the emotion—for it is necessary to say the word—which has seized upon the country and its representatives, the belief in which we still are that we should taken an immediate decision, have given us the painful impression that the French Government and Parliament are deliberating under a moral pressure, just as they deliberated, on July 29, 1929, under the threat of the bailiff.

There are, however, two essential differences. In July, 1929, the United States took us by the throat so that we would pay; in June, 1931, it urges arguments upon us that we should not be paid!

In July, 1929, it required that we should respect to the letter the contracts which we had concluded with it. In June, 1931, it exhorts us to wipe out the accords which, after 10 years of negotiations, of concessions, and of sacrifices, the nations which are creditors of Germany have concluded with their debtor. [Signs of approbation from the same benches.] And, although this time it no longer has the slightest right over us, although there exists no juridical date capable of hastening our deliberations—for the payments due from Germany are not to be made until July 15 and the date July 1 seems completely foreign to the interests of the nations and to the relations of the peoples among themselves—the prestige of the United States is so great and the tone of its voice is so dominant that our Government is in some sort dazzled by the American lighthouse and dashes itself with lowered head against the hard crystal which surrounds its light.

I am not ignorant of the fact, gentlemen, that authoritative brusqueness is in the American manner, that it constitutes part of their diplomacy, but it is for us to oppose to it the coolness and analytical spirit which are the essential qualities of our race and which, in the past, have triumphed frequently in the field of peaceful discussion.

Once these necessary reflections have been made upon the conditions in which the American proposal was presented, let us consider—this is the object of my interpellation—the French reply.

It does not seem satisfactory to me. Is that because it was improvised in a haste which nothing, as I have just said, justified, with the desire of showing a courteous celerity toward President Hoover, or is it indeed because any reply other than yes or no was necessarily confused and complex? However that may be, it remains that the French reply was of a nature to satisfy no one, neither President Hoover nor those who, in the Chamber of Deputies, approved it with their votes, nor, certainly, you all know it, the insatiable Germany.

You may well believe that I do not wish to lead you into a long examination of that reply, because, in my opinion, the problem is not there. Perhaps it is not indispensable to allude to the "elevated sentiments" which have inspired the American proposal, since President Hoover spoke to us of "outflow of gold," of "economic crisis," of "fall in American exportations," and it was thus to exceed what courtesy required to pay homage to the sentiments which these expressions betray.

Perhaps it would have been appropriate to reply to America that we were waiting to know the position which the German Government would take before making ours known. But all that, gentlemen, is a matter of form; and that which interests us is the substance.

The thing which has aroused in many of us the feeling of disquiet which I am endeavoring to express is the very cleverness with which the French note is written. What does it say? It says essentially this:

"We agree that all the payments provided for by the Young plan shall be suspended except the unconditional payments. We know, of course, that the United States does not wish to make any distinction between the conditional payments and the unconditional payments. We know that the United States even affects to ignore the reparations. But we are proposing to them a system which will suspend the reparations without saying so." Certainly, gentlemen, this is ingenious; but it is too ingenious and I fear lest it end only in dissimulating the truth to the country.

All the world knows that if the United States had consented to safeguard our rights to the reparations it would have been easy for it to propose only the remission to Germany of the conditional amounts, and all the world knows that that is precisely what the United States does not wish.

M. LE COMPTE LOUIS DE BLOIS. Very good!

M. LÉMERY. We might then either enter indeed into their views or attempt indeed to bring them to ours. But to wish to reconcile two states of mind so diametrically opposed and to wish to reconcile them by bookkeeping sacrifices, by plays of writing, and by balancings of phrases—that is, gentlemen, to expose us in the negotiations which are in progress to painful results, to grave disillusionments—it is, in any case, pardon me the word, to camouflage the truth and to deceive the country.

Finally, for I do not wish to be insistent, it seems to me that we might have said, with a little more clarity and energy, that we do not intend to grant a remission to Germany of a debt which amounts, for a single year, to 12 milliards, if Germany is to use this money in order to make herself a weapon, whether economic or military, against our allies and against ourselves. [Lively applause.]

One would say, gentlemen, to read the reply of the French Government, that it had some apprehension about employing, in its note, the word "armaments," about speaking of the German armaments, although we are constrained to envisage to-morrow the construction of warships capable of holding the German armored cruisers in check.

What did it fear in truth? That one would set our own armaments before us? But, beyond the fact that they are imposed upon us by the American default, by the fact that the United States did not honor the signature of President Wilson [lively applause] and accept the pact of four which guaranteed peace; when we build warships it is with our own money; but when Germany gives herself a battle fleet of a character clearly offensive, as the scope of action of the Deutschland testifies, it is with the money of her creditors that she constructs it! [Very good! Very good! from the center and on the right.]

M. DOMINIQUE DELAHAYE. It is the debtor who is ruining the creditor!

M. LÉMERY. Is it necessary, then, that ideas so simple, so elementary, should be obscured and that we should hesitate a little to claim for ourselves a political independence which we have won at the price of so many cruel sacrifices? [Applause.]

But the great argument of the Government, so striking in its simplicity that it disposes us to pass over all criticism, is this: "What other reply could we make to the United States? Were we not placed in the alternative either of seeing the Young plan function or of accepting the suspension of payments? We were placed before that alternative, either to accept that suspension, or to be faced by a moratorium claimed by Germany. Now, if Germany declares a moratorium, we will find ourselves in a more serious situation than if the payments are suspended. The proposal of President Hoover, amended by the mechanism which we suggest, is more advantageous, even financially, than the moratorium. Above all, it places us in a moral position which a refusal opposed to the President of the United States would have completely ruined."

Such is, gentlemen—I do not believe I have distorted it—the argument which was produced in the chamber by the Government. This it is which I wish to examine very rapidly in expressing myself on the dangers of the acceptance of the Hoover plan.

First of all, gentlemen, what is the offer of President Hoover? I have heard it recalled in our commission that it is the President of the French Republic who conducts negotiations. Is this then a project for a treaty? Is it a project for an accord? Not at all! Is it only a plan analogous to those which, on two occasions, American experts have baptized with their names? Not the least bit in the world.

It is, gentlemen—and the President has emphasized it with perfect loyalty, with a sense of fair play to which I pay tribute—a view which is, so to speak, personal, a sort of voluntary, benevolent arbitration which he proposes, a suggestion which in order to become a reality should first of all be accepted by the interested parties, that is understood, but which should afterwards and above all be accepted by the American Congress, which, as you know, gentlemen, does not meet until next December.

Now, it is not certain that even if the Hoover proposal had been accepted without any reservation the Congress would have followed its President. It is still less certain since we are introducing reservations into the Hoover proposal. The more we strive to place, more or less well, that proposal in harmony with the Young plan and the accords of The Hague the more we try to safeguard our sacred right to reparations, the more we diminish the chances of seeing the American Congress follow the proposals of the President of the United States.

It is not necessary, then, to repeat the mistake of 1919 and to reject as improbable the idea of a Congress rejecting the personal gesture of its President.

Have you considered, Mr. President of the Council, that if this hypothesis is realized it will place us in a terrible situation? All Europe, entirely engaged upon the course of renunciation of credits, would be forced abruptly to reverse gears. The United States might claim the settlement of our debts in December, although for six months we should have received no payment from Germany. The German payments which the Bank for International Settlements would have taken in under the unconditional heading, and which in our plan it would have been invested in private German enterprises, would have to be immediately recalled, definitively ruining an economy which we are endeavoring to consolidate. German credit would be more compromised than it can be to-day, but above all our credit and that of the United States would undergo the same fate. [Very good! Very good!]

Let us now consider the other hypothesis.

The American Congress ratifies the Hoover proposal, even with the modifications which we seek. Can one truly hope that this Franco-American plan, if it operates only during one year, can have any efficacy? Who can seriously believe that on the 1st of July, 1932, Germany will have put her finances in order again and that she will resume the service of the Young plan? If that were the case, if 12 months of suspension of payments would really suffice to reestablish economic harmony in Germany, the United States would be very badly inspired in wishing to impose upon us the renunciation of the unconditional part. That part amounts, for one year, to the relatively insignificant sum of 612,000,000 marks. Who could be convinced that the United States, which has invested in Germany nearly two hundred milliards of francs, could not give the Reich a loan of 612,000,000 marks if that loan could save the German economy? [Very good! Very good!]

No, gentlemen, the Hoover proposal can have no efficacy. I will go further, it can have no sense—it would be absurd to deceive oneself—unless it continues beyond the duration of one year. But, in that case, the whole economy of the system conceived by the French Government is upset.

It is impossible, Mr. Minister of Finance, to balance the budget "in writings" as you have exhibited it to the Chamber. It becomes impossible to inscribe, thanks to a "slight reduction of eight days," as you have said, the unconditional payments which the Bank for International Settlements would have invested for us in Germany and which it should have recalled at the expiration of the year.

We remain before a hole of about two milliards made in our budget, and we can not fill it up save by imposing further taxes on the French taxpayer, already crushed by the impost. [Lively applause.]

Let me, gentlemen, summarize the situation somewhat brutally. Either the Hoover proposal, amended by us, lasts only one year, and then it has no value, or it lasts more than a year; and then it is we who pay the reparations which Germany, responsible for the war, owes.

That, it is necessary to say to the country. It is necessary that the country should know that it is that which Germany wishes; she proclaims it by her rulers, by all her parties, by all her press. I desire no further proof of it than the manifesto to the German nation issued by the Government of the Reich on June 5, 1931, which states:

"The Government is conscious that the economic and financial situation of the Reich imperiously requires that Germany should be released from intolerable obligations under the heading of reparations."

Nothing, gentlemen, could be clearer.

Finally—and the point of view which I am now going to set forth is not less important than that in regard to which I have just explained myself—even if the Hoover proposal were an efficacious remedy for the German, European, and world crisis, it would have the grave drawback of bringing back into question accords which have solemnly been declared definitive and unalterable.

When we were presented with the conventions in question the legal project was entitled:

"Project of law carrying approbation of the different accords entered into at The Hague, August 31, 1929, and January 20, 1930, in view of the complete and definitive settlement of the problem of reparations."

Consequently, as it has already been said with eloquence in the Chamber, if, after one year, accords such as those of The Hague, proclaimed inviolate, declared to be so before the French Parliament in order to secure its vote, can be called into question again; if, for conventions which have been studied at length, freely discussed, and freely accepted, one can substitute other conventions under the pretext that they appear more opportune, I say that there is no more security for anyone, that there is no more stability for any nation, and that never more will any confidence be possible. [Lively applause.]

M. LE COMTE LOUIS DE BLOIS. That is all that has been done for the past 10 years.

M. HENRY LÉMERY. When one considers with what prudence the experts of the Young plan have defined the unconditional part; when one reads in their report, chapter 8, paragraph 115, that sentence which one must never tire of quoting:

"We recognize the fact that in fixing the amount payable by Germany in foreign exchanges, without any right of postponement at 660,000,000 reichsmarks, we have adopted a figure dictated by prudence; nevertheless, we are certain that it is wiser to undervalue with deliberate intent than to run the slightest risk of weakening the credit of Germany in proposing a figure which could not immediately be accepted by a well-informed public opinion."

When, I say, one reads that sentence one acquires an understanding of the danger there is in touching either the principle of the unconditional part or the reality of the unconditional annuities. This amount of 612,000,000 of reichsmarks which should be transferred in any case to the Bank for International Settlements for the services of reparations is all that remains of the charge which rests justly upon Germany for the damages for which we will never cease to repeat that she is fully responsible.

Of these six hundred and twelve millions, five hundred come to us, which sufficiently explains the fact that other nations have hastened to accept a proposal whic does not touch them themselves, for in this matter it is we who are the victims and none of the experts of the Young plan, none of the signatories of the accords of The Hague, was able even to imagine that a great nation like Germany would declare herself incapable of paying that obole.

Everything was provided for by the experts of the Young plan, by the plenipotentiaries of the Hague Conference, except the case of a Germany incapable of paying an annuity of 612,000,000 marks. It is, nevertheless, this meager remnant that one wishes to touch.

It would truly be necessary to be very blind not to see what a dangerous precedent the acceptance of the Hoover proposal creates. To touch the Young plan, to bring back into question, either under a direct form or under an indirect one, the annuity proclaimed unconditional, this is to declare with Germany that treaties are scraps of paper; that engagements subscribed to have no importance; and that the opinion of experts is, like all the rest, absolutely useless. [Lively applause.]

I conclude, then, that the dangers of the suspension of payments, as it results from the Hoover proposal, even though modified by the French reply, and admitting that it will be ratified by the American Congress, are not negligible. I even declare, gentlemen, that they are so diverse, so unforeseen, so unforeseeable, that it is impossible for anyone to evaluate them.

As for the dangers of the moratorium, the other solution which might be envisaged, we know them well. They are defined; we can calculate exactly the extent of the sacrifices which they involve. These sacrifices involve the obligation for France to complete the guaranty fund of 500,000,000 marks—of which 300,000,000 are already paid—which is destined to insure payments to the creditor powers, among which is Belgium, who do not receive anything from the unconditional annuity when the Young plan functions normally.

But these 200,000,000 marks to be paid by us would only have been a Treasury disbursement, a loan to the Bank for International Settlements, a loan which would bear interest to our profit if the moratorium were prolonged for more than five years.

Is it necessary to count also, among the disadvantages of the moratorium, the obligation by which we should have had to pay America just the same? I believe, then, nothing would have prevented us from recalling to the United States the resolution which the French Senate voted, according to which France engages to pay the war debts only to the extent to which she is paid by Germany, for I suppose that that resolution was not an empty gesture designed to mask a speculation.

Then, in the chapter of disadvantages, the obligation of completing, by the addition of 200,000,000 marks, the guarantee fund. But in the chapter of advantages two things of vital importance: First, a settlement, to some extent automatic, of the situation and a settlement on the basis of the treaties. We would not have to improvise in a few hours or in a few days a system which runs the risk of compromising the future irremediably. We would only have to apply the Young plan, which rejects a moratorium for the unconditional payments and which exactly delimits the rights and duties of each.

But, above all, the request for a moratorium, according to the procedure of the treaties in force, which proclaim—article 8 of the accord of The Hague—that "Germany alone is qualified to present a request for a moratorium," would have brought with it a consequence which has not perhaps been sufficiently brought to light. That is the immediate convocation of a consultative committee charged with examining the reasons for which Germany finds herself under the necessity of suspending the transfers, and charged also with submitting for the examination of the interested governments the measures which should be taken in order to return to the execution of the plan. [Lively approbation from numerous benches.]

This consultative committee is not a phantom; its functions are defined at length throughout chapter—of article 8 of the Young plan, and in the minds of experts, as in that of the signatories of the accords of The Hague, this committee has so much importance that France is only obliged to establish the guarantee fund of 500,000,000 marks, of which I have just spoken, when measures have been taken to bring about the convocation of the consultative committee.

Then, gentlemen, the question which comes to all minds, which I have met on the lips of all my colleagues of the Senate when we have spoken of this matter, is the following: "Is it in order to avoid the investigations of this consultative committee that the American intervention was imagined [Very good! Very good! and applause] and that the present procedure was suddenly invented?"

How then! Germany is held by the treaties, if she wishes a moratorium, to request it herself, and to request it for the conditional part of the payments, for that part alone. Her request should be made 90 days before the moratorium is to be declared. Her next payments are due July 15, and if the moratorium was to come into effect July 15, her request should have been made April 15. Now, it was only on the 17th of June that the ambassador of Germany at Paris informed the French Government that his country would soon be constrained to ask a moratorium. He waited, in order to take these steps, until France had paid two days before, on the 15th of June, to the United States the amount that she owed in payment of her debt.

M. DOMINIQUE DELAHAYE. What is good to take is good tc keep.

M. HENRY LÉMERY. And three days after the action of the ambassador of Germany, President Hoover issued his proposal.

In truth, gentlemen, everything happened as if one had waited until France had paid America before saying to us, "And now Germany will not pay." [Very good! and applause.]

How, in these conditions, can we permit the intervention of President Hoover to have as a result, not only the destruction of the Young plan but also the effect of sparing Germany the inquiries and the control provided for by the accords of The Hague and intrusted to a consultative committee whose powers have been solemnly recognized and defined?

That, gentlemen, is not admissible. Even if the Hoover proposal were less disadvantageous for us, financially speaking, than the suspension resulting from the moratorium contractually provided for by the Young plan, with an inquiry and control, it would seem to me that that solution would still be preferable to the proposal with which we are confronted.

For that solution, indeed, the President of the Council would certainly have found a more homogeneous majority in the Chamber than the one which gave its approval to the Government. [Very good! Very good! and various movements.]

I hear indeed the reply of those who see in the gesture of Mr. Hoover the prelude to the regeneration of the world, to general disarmament. I have heard the appeal to confidence which the Chancellor of Germany formulated in pathetic terms. That appeal to confidence, we rediscovered it regularly in all the international acts which have registered the sacrifices which we make, we ourselves. To-day it is the Young plan which is injuring the confidence so desirable between peaceful nations; yesterday it was the occupation of the Rhineland; to-morrow Germany, free from her debt, will find other clauses in the treaty of Versailles which hinder confidence and which require new surrenders. For during the past 10 years the situation, in truth, is clear; our sacrifices are always for to-day; confidence is always for to-morrow. [Very good! and applause.]

To conclude, if it is true that the situation of Germany is as desperate as it is declared to be, is it possible that our Government should have known nothing of it? If it did know it, why did it not propose a remedy in time? Why did it not suggest any plan in time? Why did it wait, with folded arms, until the United States took command of the maneuver? Has France then become sterile? Are we, henceforth, destined to drag along in the wake of the great powers, as if we were left out of the number of the great powers?

That, gentlemen, is what is dramatic in the manner in which, yesterday, the Austro-German accord was concluded, which our ambassadors had not foreseen; in which, more recently, the proposal of President Hoover, which had long been in the course of preparation without our agents having known anything of it, arose.

For 10 years we have lived with our eyes fixed on the star of peace. Each time that one has asked us for concessions that were real and tangible, and immediate, we have granted them in the hope that they would have a recompense; that is, the institution in the world of the spirit of peace and of solidarity.

Now, each time that recompense, which is of an ideal and spiritual order, retreats, and, in the words of the poet, its flight is eternal.

We evacuate the Rhineland and our troops, who withdraw voluntarily, are insulated——

M. DOMINIQUE DELAHAYE. What a mistake!

M. HENRY LÉMERY. We reduce our claims, and the demonstrations of the Hitlerians become more violent, and the Steel Helmets take an oath before the eyes of the crown prince, to whom we have given permission to return to Germany, to destroy the treaty of Versailles. Our Government lends an ear to the proposal of President Hoover; it is answered with the manifestation of the students of Potsdam, with the discourse of Doctor Schacht, with a flood of insults, of threats in the German press.

Mr. President of the Council, we do not intend to hamper your negotiations. You will assume your responsibilities. [Very good!] We only ask you not to forget that there is no peace for nations, that there is no peace for men, if signed treaties, if past conventions are not respected. [Applause from a large number of benches.] It is, Mr. President of the Council, around that idea, simple as truth and strong as morality, it is around that idea that the Government should endeavor to group all the peoples that have a taste for loyalty, all the men who fear equivocation, uncertain hopes, and deceptive illusions.

That will be the significance of the order of the day which I shall offer. [Lively applause from a large number of benches.

The speaker, in returning to his place, receives the felicitations of his colleagues.]

[Extracts from the Official Journal of the French Republic of June 26, 1931, concerning the Hoover proposal]

RESUMPTION OF THE DISCUSSION OF THE INTERPELLATIONS

The PRESIDENT. We return to the interpellations.

M. Louis Marin has the floor as the author of the third interpellation.

M. LOUIS MARIN. I have always said at the Chamber that, in a democratic and parliamentary régime, not only the duty but the evident interest of the governments was to seek to support themselves on opinion and on the parliament.

I do not believe that there is a better example of that necessity than the situation created by the proposal of President Hoover.

During the eight days since the proposal became known in France it has aroused a profound emotion, I will even say a veritable anguish, although the entire opinion of this country has known how to preserve an absolute calm and dignity in the circumstances. [Applause on the right.]

If I correctly understood the attitude of the Parliament last Tuesday, I had the same impression of unanimity on the gravity which that unexpected proposal presents and on the necessity of grouping ourselves in order to safeguard with the last rights to the minimum amount of our reparations which are left to us—in short, our legal rights.

To-day it is not a question for me—nor, I think, for anyone—of ascertaining what the responsibilities of the past may be among us. If I have always thought that there was no parliamentarianism and no government with responsibility and, above all, without exemplary sanctions, the past does not interest us at this moment, before the gravity of the decision to be taken.

That some of us were right and others wrong, that we might have acted otherwise, makes little difference to us now.

That which interests us essentially is to know what to think of the Hoover proposal and what to do to-morrow before the negotiations which the Government is conducting, in the course of the votes which we shall have to cast, on the one hand, this evening or in a few days; on the other hand, when we shall be presented with the necessary legal project, for it is only by a law that one can touch the national law which incorporates the dispositions of the Young plan.

I was speaking of public opinion and of the gravity with which it has envisaged this question. There has not been for a very long time such emotion in our provinces.

This is because they have understood that for the first time in history one saw produced a proposition so important, so unexpected, and, above all, bearing not only on the interests of the country that made it but also on the interests of peoples outside the life of which the United States had up to that time wished to remain. It is, then, necessary that we should examine that proposal in all its consequences.

The first observation which I wish to make is this: What is the value of the proposal of the President of the United States for the year which begins on July 1—a proposal for the suspension of all payment on the part of Germany and of international payments in the course of the year 1931–32?

M. Margaine has already admirably demonstrated it from the point of view of the facts, and M. Dubois from the point of view of the law. My task will accordingly be lightened.

I said last Tuesday that, for the United States, the operation proposed by their President was perfectly understandable.

The United States propose to sacrifice a little more than 6 milliards of francs which are due to them. But, on the other hand, at least 250 milliards of francs are invested in German business, on the part of American individuals, on the part of large American enterprises, and on the part of American banks.

I said 200 milliards last Tuesday; but a more attentive study of the documents obliges me to correct my figures. You have been able to see, enumerated one by one, in the Figaro of this morning, what German industrial bonds, to the value of more than 50 milliards of francs, were held in New York; they form only a slight part of the American capital invested in Germany, and the greater part was recently in serious difficulties. [Various movements.]

I understand perfectly, in these conditions, a political operation in which a head of state, who has authority for it, except for reservation and reference to his congress, places in the balance an immediate loss for the budget of the state against a possible gain of considerable sums for the economy of his people, although the formidable effect on the exchange which followed it did not remedy anything, for the gain of some was brought about at the expense of others.

I also see the certain advantage which, for this year, Germany will derive from that operation. Germany will not pay ten milliards and a half of francs which burdened her budget legitimately, since they represented a minimum amount of all the debts which were imposed upon her by the treaties.

To tell the truth, that advantage is, for Germany, an advantage which is, above all, a moral advantage and one which stimulates her instincts which are destructive of the treaty of Versailles and, first of all, of what she so unjustly calls the tribute of reparations. From the financial point of view the remedy is mediocre. The budget of the Reich is colossal and it represents, moreover, only a slight part of the budget of Germany; in addition, in that country, neither the budget of the states, which is very substantial, nor the budget of the towns, which is infinitely higher than that of our departments and of our communes, must be overlooked.

Those who know Germany will not contradict me.

These ten milliards and a half of francs, the remission of which represents a political triumph for the Reich, are a relatively small matter for the finances of Germany; nevertheless, they do represent an appreciable benefice for her, which she will waste in other fields since, following the publication of the news, she has already stopped the projects for reducing the salaries of functionaries, just as she stopped, at Cherbourg, a shipment of gold for the United States.

I imagine, therefore—I shall say why in a little while—that, in view of the present, and above all in view of the future, she is still more happy than the industrialists and bankers in the United States could have been on learning that a political operation was going to make it possible to save them from the shipwreck which threatened them.

There are countries which are affected and from which nothing but sacrifices are asked.

I do not speak of the sacrifices of England, which are very slight.

I do not even speak of those of Italy, which are more considerable but which she has already accepted, nor of those of ravaged Yugoslavia, of Rumania, of Greece, or of any other country of central Europe, or even of Portugal or Japan; whatever the sacrifice that has been imposed upon them without their having first been consulted, the amounts are, to tell the truth, not very considerable.

I think, on the contrary, of the sacrifices of Belgium and of France, which, nevertheless, were so unjustly and so horribly ravaged during 52 months and which, since then, have added so many further sacrifices during the peace to those which they had accepted, in their struggle for the right, during the war.

For Belgium, seven hundred millions have been promised to her unconditionally. That is a sum which she has entered in her budget, on which she counts, and for the replacement of which she will be obliged to institute new taxes; a hard result for a friendly country which was unjustly ravaged and which conducted herself so magnificently.

For France, and without going over the details given by M. Margaine and M. Dubois, the one billion nine hundred and fifty-nine millions, the two milliards in round numbers of which M. Dubois has spoken, or more exactly, the two milliards and a half which will be lacking in our budget, it will indeed be necessary this year——

M. ALBERT BEDOUCE. No; it is a question of one thousand seven hundred millions.

M. LOUIS MARIN. That is not my opinion. We will discuss these figures in detail.

M. ALBERT BEDOUCE. We will discuss them when you wish. It is a question of one thousand seven hundred and forty-nine millions exactly.

M. LOUIS MARIN. Intentionally, Monsieur Bedouce, I do not wish to enter into consideration on the eighty millions of the unconditional part which we give up in order to pay our interallied war debts, and which are added for this purpose to the conditional part. Consequently, although forming part of the unconditional part, that amount does not come to us and does not figure in our budget. I do not wish to take at this moment the time of the Chamber for these detailed discriminations and a certain number of differentiations which Monsieur Dubois has already pointed out from the tribune and which will appear in the Official Journal. I take for the moment the round number of 2 milliards.

M. ALBERT BEDOUCE. It is exaggerated. [Exclamations from the right.]

M. LOUIS MARIN. Monsieur Bedouce, I can not let you say that it is exaggerated, for when it will be necessary to replace these 2 milliards by 2 milliards of taxes the question will arise very serious and very weighty. [Applause from the right, in the center, and from several benches on the left.]

I do not wish to reduce this problem to a question of money, or even of taxation, serious as this already is.

But have we, I ask this of the Minister of Finance and of the Minister of the Budget, a financial situation so flourishing that we can waste the resources of our budget? Is there not a hole of 2 milliards in the budget of the past period? Are not the diminutions of value in the present period causing us grave disquietude? Does the balance of our foreign trade not mark a disturbing falling off which is amounting to a deficit of 1 milliard a month; that is to say, perhaps 12 milliards in the year?

Do not all these signs, and others besides, dictate to us our conduct? I am not doing anything but bringing forward what the Ministers of Finance and of the Budget will say to us during budgetary or financial discussions.

Thus, we are before a very disquieting financial situation. And it is here that all at once we are told: "It will be necessary to find two milliards or two milliards and a half of new taxes."

Thus, Monsieur Bedouce, you see that that question of money——

M. ALBERT BEDOUCE. Once more, it is not a question of two milliards and a half.

M. LOUIS MARIN. One may say that when M. Bedouce has an idea in his head he has it nowhere else. [Smiles.]

Mr. ALBERT BEDOUCE. It is of interest to everyone to give exact figures.

M. LOUIS MARIN. I ask M. Bedouce, in the name of the long collaboration which has united us for more than a quarter of a century, not to seek to impose his figure, which he claims to be exact, on my figure, which I claim to be as exact. It would be necessary for us to spend too much time in discussing them——

M. PIERRE-ETIENNE FLANDIN (Minister of Finance). All the more so because they are both inexact. [Various movements.]

M. LOUIS MARIN. Mr. Minister of Finance, you do not bring us into agreement, for we have learned that you are quite an expert in inexact figures. [Various movements.]

In those, notably, which you have furnished to the press these last few days we have observed the height of inexactitude.

Then, if you will be so good, let us hold, in conducting our considerations, to average figures, all the more so because, alas, we will meet these figures again.

That which is incontestable is that for us the operation which we are asked to accept is represented for this year by a considerable sacrifice [Very good! Very good!], although we are in a financially difficult situation, and although it will be necessary to vote new taxes, which will be added to others which will still have to be found for other reasons, which you all know.

M. PIETRI, Minister of the Budget. It is not exact in the case of the counterproposal.

M. HENRY FRANKLIN-BOUILLON. There is, moreover, the figure which is mentioned in the note sent by the Secretary of State to the Treasury.

He states in that that the operation will cost France $96,000,000, approximately. You see how little that figure given by the Americans themselves approaches the figure of 2 milliards of francs.

M. GRUMBACH. That proves that M. Bedouce was right. [Smiles.]

M. HENRY FRANKLIN-BOUILLON. They are all right, including the American Secretary of State. Nevertheless, we are not going to ask them to agree in regard to the centimes!

M. LOUIS MARIN. M. Grumbach could not fail to say, for the sake of group solidarity, that M. Bedouce was right, any more than M. Pietri could fail to sustain the Minister of Finance for the sake of ministerial solidarity. [Smiles.]

It is indeed necessary that, sometimes, ministerial solidarity should manifest itself. [Laughter.]

It is a thing one sometimes sees; it is indeed necessary that it should manifest itself even in public.

The PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL. One sees that you have been a minister.

M. LOUIS MARIN. The operation proposed by President Hoover is represented exclusively by a sacrifice for us, as for Belgium and the states of eastern Europe.

The advantages that are made to sparkle before our eyes as compensation are not for us. It seems, moreover, that for the past 10 years we are always asked for sacrifices without being offered any compensation other than words. There is, in fact, no advantage for us in the operation that they wish to impose upon us; there are only disadvantages for 1931–32.

They try to make an advantage appear before our eyes by telling us that the sacrifice which we are going to make will aid the general economy of the world.

I would willingly grant it if that were so.

France is never the last to make sacrifices for the general economy of the world, and I believe that no one on this score could give her any lessons. [Applause on the right and in the center.]

Neither before the war, nor during the war, nor since could one find a country which has made so many sacrifices as ours in order to assure peace and economic equilibrium in the world. [Applause from the same benches.]

But, in spite of the firmness with which President Hoover, in the first words of his note, declares that it is a question of reestablishing the economic equilibrium of the world, I answer: No.

It is only a question of one country, and of those who have imprudently confided capital to that country.

It is only a question of reestablishing German economy——

[From the right.] And American.

M. LOUIS MARIN. And a part of American economy, the bankers who have invested substantial amounts of capital in Germany. [Applause from various benches.]

But for the rest of the world, I assert that this project, presented as useful to world economy, is without any effect, and that none is even sought. It concerns only one country—Germany—and by way of accessory one creditor of that country, the United States.

Can we, at least, even as regards Germany, have the idea that the moratorium of payments which will be given to her for 1931–32 will serve to save her economy?

M. Margaine has done justice to the complaints of Germany on the subject of her economy. He has shown by figures, which relieve me of the necessity of making the proof myself, how the commercial balance of Germany was favorable, how her exportations were considerable and increased from day to day. Perhaps he has not insisted enough on this point and on the danger which, from this fact, certain of our own industries were running.

We know also—and M. Margaine has shown it—what extravagances of all kinds the German budget contains. And if M. Herriot speaks in the course of this discussion, I am sure that he will show—I have an impression of it from his articles—what extravagances Germany commits from the point of view of military and naval preparation.

It is M. Herriot who tells us, for instance, very justly, that it is we who will pay for the Deutschland, with money which we should have received for our reparations. [Lively applause in the center, on the right, and on the left.]

It will be the same with the six Deutschlands which are to follow; it will be exactly the necessary amount which we are going to lend to the Bank for International Settlements.

I do not take the credit of having established this fact away from you, Monsieur Herriot. I cite it as an excellent example, among many others, alas!

All those who study Germany, who examine her budgets, perceive that the two causes of the weakening of the German economy are these extravagances, notably the military extravagances——

M. ALPHONSE TELLIER. According to the treaty of Versailles, Germany should not have been authorized to construct those vessels!

M. LOUIS MARIN. And, on the other hand, those political manifestations, such as those of the Steel Helmets, such as the aggressive and violent discourses of so many ministers, which cause foreign capital and even German capital to flee. [Applause in the center and on the right.]

If so much German capital and foreign capital has been withdrawn in the course of these last months and if last week there was very nearly not an economic crisis or even a financial one but an exchange crisis in Germany, it was the counterpoise to political manifestations which were quite unseasonable.

Men of the most diverse political opinions, over there and among us, recognize the fact. Monsieur Grumbach, do you wish me to invoke the opinion of your friends? M. Gaston Jeze, who is one of your friends. . . [Interruptions from the extreme left.]

Yes; Monsieur Frossard. Ask it, then, of M. Vincent Auriol!

M. L.-O. FROSSARD. It is a long time since M. Gaston Jeze has rejoined you, Monsieur Marin.

M. LOUIS MARIN. So much the better! I should not like to misuse quotations and remain in the domain of leading ideas, in such a debate; but I will read you what M. Jeze wrote a few days ago:

"The German Reich has not made a good use of the financial liberty which was given to her in 1930. This is the proof that a good international financial control renders services to the countries which have submitted to it.

"These States protest in the name of their prestige, but it is not necessary to talk about prestige when one does not know how to manage one's own affairs. This is the case with Germany."

[Applause.]

That is the conclusion of his last article, probably in regard to the Hoover plan.

The operation proposed by Mr. Hoover is going to be costly to us ourselves, since, like Belgium, we are asked for sacrifices. If only we had the consolation of thinking that that operation might aid the German economy! But no; it will not aid either the Germany economy or the finances of Germany or her banking movement.

I see you protest, Monsieur Grumbach——

M. GRUMBACH. I said nothing! Is it my silence that protests?

M. LOUIS MARIN. No; it is the language of your hands. [Exclamations and laughter on the extreme left.]

The PRESIDENT. If he could always interrupt with his hands! [Laughter.]

M. LOUIS MARIN. If President Hoover had proposed to us not the suspension of payments by Germany and of payment of the interallied debts during one year, which, for the general credit and the movement of minds, can have, at the end of a few days, only a slight importance, but the annulment of all the interallied debts, that is to say, of the common expenses of the war, which should have been logically and equitably divided, and leaving apart the sacred reparations, that great operation might have been efficacious.

Europe, seeing itself relieved of the payment of the milliards which it is to send across the Atlantic during the 62 years, such an announcement would have astonished the world; but it might have had a certain repercussion on the operations of credit and would have constituted an operation useful to European finances. [Applause in the center and on the right.]

If in order to remedy German unemployment and ameliorate Germany economy President Hoover had asked us, to the end of putting the German factories to work, to agree to increase the deliveries in kind, without doubt certain countries like England, attached to their industry, which is formidably threatened by Germany, would have protested; we would, perhaps, ourselves have been obliged to defend our industries and to make use of triangular deliveries, as proposed last year.

But I understand that such a remedy might have palliated German unemployment and ameliorated somewhat the economy of the Reich.

When one speaks to us of a financial and exchange remedy, when I learn that the Bank of France advanced a few days ago one hundred millions of gold to the Reichsbank, so that it might avert a new monetary crisis——

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That is inexact.

M. LOUIS MARIN. You may make the correction presently, if the two facts which I maintain and which I am about to indicate are not exact. But, if you prefer, I will content myself with hypotheses, which is equally useful for my demonstration, instead of citing realities, however instructive.

If you prefer, then, I will suppose that gold is lent to Germany. In this case I understand that at the moment when the Reichsbank sees its reserve diminish and unfortunately approach the critical point, this loan of gold may render it a very great service.

I understand, also, if the German banks have difficulties at the end of the month, like those of June and July, and if they are offered loans, serious guarantees being employed, that, evidently, another operation useful for German finances is thus performed.

But I declare that the operation proposed by President Hoover can not really aid German economy, although it costs us terribly dear.

It does not only cost us two milliards and a half, it has, for us, a moral aspect which is of an incontestable gravity.

For years we were asked to agree to reductions of our claims. And then, one doy, we were told: "Now your claim is definitive, you no longer run any risk."

M. Dubois was right to cite the text of the Official Journal in order to show the seriousness of this matter.

We were told: "You will no longer run any risk after your sacrifices; it is now an unconditional debt before which you will find yourselves. It is a sacred debt which will be paid in any and all circumstances. There can be no moratorium for this unconditional part which will not be postponable under any pretext. Undoubtedly the reparations which were due to you are diminished; instead of the considerable sums which were justly fixed by the previous schedule of payments and which were already far from corresponding to the real amount of our devastation, you will only receive a little, but you will surely receive it. It is a solemn promise!"

"We should so surely receive it," said M. Poincare, "that the unconditional part should be commercialized."

And he added: "We will not vote for the project until the commercialization is not only promised but realized." [Very good! Very good! in the center.]

Who can now have the hope of commercializing the immense quantity of the unconditional obligations of the Young plan which have not yet been commercialized? [Applause in the center, on the right, and from various benches on the left.]

It was only because it was incontestably unconditional that that part of the German debt could be commercialized.

Now, see how, all at once, evidently for a reason independent of Germany—although, presently, we shall see how the first negotiations which led to the proposal of President Hoover arose and how Berlin was their source—for some reason or other, unknown to us, apart from us, without our having been forewarned, the unconditional character of that part is brought into question, and, so to speak, destroyed at the first blow.

And what are we told? See, it is so little unconditional even in your own eyes that there even you, Frenchmen, and the English and the Italians abandon it! For, in the proposals of the Government, even if you have it paid to the Bank of International Settlements, in order that it, in its turn, may give it to Germany, you are not paid; it is exactly as if the unconditional part were suspended. It is a genuine moratorium. You are paid with words and you will never again have a confidence firm enough to assure commercialization.

Who can imagine that there are still financiers who could think of commercializing any part whatever of the Young plan? [Lively applause.]

For the period 1931–32, then, there will be: New taxes, a serious breach of the given word. Although we thought we were building on the rock, there is the impossibility henceforth of commercialization.

But there is something much more serious than what may happen to us for the period 1931–32. We are at this moment before the habitual lure. Here is a proposal which affects only one year. But for the past 10 years you have known the lures: Proposals are made which are anodyne in appearance, which it seems possible to accept, not with a light heart, if one is ever so slightly perspicacious, but because they are presented in a form which does not alarm.

Nevertheless, in reality, who among you does not say to himself that at this moment it is the fate of the whole Young plan and of the 60 years of it which are left to run which is at stake? [Applause from various benches.]

If the French Government, if M. Laval, endeavors at this moment to make conditions, to cause the sacred character of the reparations to prevail, it is only to save face, as they say, it is in order to try to save the future and to try to save something of the Young plan. I do not believe—quite the contrary—that the proposals which I have heard read will accomplish that. But who, then, can have much hope of accomplishing it except with a formal resistance of the French Parliament? [Applause.]

If the French Parliament does not indicate clearly that it intends that the unconditional part shall not be touched, that the future of the Young plan shall not be touched; if it does not require that that part shall be paid, and paid to ourselves for our reparations; if its vote does not say this with all the firmness necessary, the Young plan is dead. [Applause from numerous benches.]

Mr. President of the Council and Mr. Minister of Finance, I am delighted to see that at least you two among the ministers have applauded.

The PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL. All the ministers have applauded.

M. FRANCOIS ALBERT. I demand the floor for an appeal to the rule. The senators who are ministers have no right to applaud. [Smiles.]

M. LOUIS MARIN. When they are good things that are said on the tribune, the senators who are ministers have the right to applaud. [Smiles.] When they try to criticize parliamentary deputies, we may contest them that right, Monsieur Francois Albert. When they applaud us, let them do it, in spite of the rule.

M. FRANCOIS ALBERT. When they applaud you!

M. LOUIS MARIN. When they applaud one of us, whoever he may be.

M. FRANCOIS ALBERT. Of the majority!

M. LOUIS MARIN. We have not come to that egotism. We have come to it so little to-day that the object of the debate is one of those on which we can all find ourselves in agreement.

What is serious, I was saying, is that the Young plan is threatened in its totality. It had already been threatened by Germany before. You have all read the renewed and aggressive declarations of German men of politics and of the German press, declarations more and more vigorous, calling for the death of the Young plan, the abolition of the "tribute"!

Every day, newspapers curse this tribute. Even on the day after the Hoover proposal, a number of German newspapers ask that, if it is accepted, if there is a moratorium for one year, the struggle shall be continued with all the more bitterness in order to destroy it completely.

I do not need to read you the texts. Some days ago, a review, in order to illustrate German thought on the Hoover proposal, grouped the articles from the German newspapers—it is not M. Gignoux who will contradict me—and took account of public opinion in Germany on the future of the Young plan. Not one of these newspapers—I have them under my eyes—from the most conservative to the most revolutionary, which did not express the same opinion: It is necessary to continue the struggle to the death against the Young plan and to destroy it without delay.

We knew, then, that it was menaced, but by Germany. The cleverest and most prudent of the Germans, like M. Stresemann, had said: "It will last 10 years." His successors had said: "It will, perhaps, last two years." No one dared to say: "At the end of one year we will see it, I do not say set at naught, but struck a blow which will be mortal if the French Parliament does not manifest its formal purpose to maintain it." [Applause.]

Nevertheless the unalterable character of the Young plan and of the unconditional annuities has been more solemnly affirmed than that of any other financial treaty.

I might recall to M. Tardieu his sensational declarations, on his return from The Hague, on the vital importance of the word "definitive" and of the absolute security of the unconditional part.

I might also recall to M. Paul Reynaud the striking and persuasive demonstrations which he made us, based on the truly definitive and unconditional character of the settlement entered into.

M. PAUL REYNAUD, Minister of the Colonies. I have not changed my opinion, Monsieur Louis Marin.

M. LOUIS MARIN. Wait! We are going to see what will become of your declarations or, rather, alas, what has already become of them.

I do not wish to speak at this moment save of certain ministers of whom I have the formal declarations at hand which we have heard, one or another.

Abroad it was infinitely more solemn. Twenty-eight states had given their signatures. Was there a representative of one of those states who did not believe in the solidity of the unconditional part? In any case, all have affirmed their convictions on this point.

We are indeed obliged to say to ourselves that if we do not take the most extreme precautions and the most certain guaranties the Young plan will have received a mortal blow. And I do not wish to speak of simple verbal guaranties, of those of which M. Franklin-Bouillon said that they were only too prodigal.

Let us take care. The destruction of the Young plan would be a fact more serious still in other ways than the loss for one year of two milliards and a half. And more serious still than the financial charges which would weigh for a long time on this country, would be the moral and political consequences.

Nations live, above all, by the moral principles which animate them. [Applause.]

In international life—we are certainly all in agreement on this point—in which the policeman does not yet exist, in which the tribunal is barely beginning to function, without disposing, moreover, by any practical sanction, the observance of the elementary principles of moral conscience is a vital matter. [Lively applause.]

Let no one speak to us in the future of signing pacts if one is not sure that they will be scrupulously and conscientiously observed. [Fresh applause.]

It must indeed be said that here is a singular manner of respecting the given word, vital principle of all social life, and above all, of all international life.

I will not read you texts, but there is one which comes to my mind. In a letter, concerning himself with interallied debts, President Coolidge indicated to what an extent the American people had respect for the given word and for contracts.

Is it not singular, when we have signed contracts, that voices should be raised from another part of the world to say to us: "Break these contracts! It is not necessary or indeed we will not be able ourselves to accomplish an operation which is advantageous to Germany and to Europe at the same time that it is advantageous to us."

Respect for contracts is a vital matter. But there is more; here, it is a question of respect for particularly solemn international pacts, of which, in international life, one ought not to tolerate any infraction, especially if it is oblique and masked by generosity.

The Young plan is not only, as M. Louis Dubois said, the result of long years of tentatives and events. It was solemnly prepared, solemnly presented, and solemnly accepted. And we are told: "You were counting on that pact to be able to commercialize the unconditional annuities? You can mourn over that, for this year. It is not what you believe." Such is the will of a nation which, moreover, did not participate in the Young plan nor in the discussion of the European Continent. [Applause.]

It is necessary, they tell us, to make trash of these stipulations. You can get no use out of them by relying on them.

I will add that, not only do the texts in question merit the respect due to international pacts but they merit also the respect that one owes to the laws of each sovereign country.

Just so, in fact, the Young plan has been voted by a very great number of parliaments. The countries interested as creditors or as debtors have incorporated it, sometimes not without trouble, into their internal legislation. What does one do, at this moment, with the respect due to the laws of the countries which have voted them? One tells us that it is necessary to pass beyond our own laws; that it is necessary that the governments should arrange themselves in such a manner as to cause our laws to be abrogated!

I do not believe that these are excellent methods for international life.

I believe them to be all the more evil because they lead further to neglect of the respect for the forms and guaranties written in the contracts.

For, after all, in the Young plan, France, if she were not paid, and Germany, if she could not pay, had, both the one and the other, a procedure and a certain number of guaranties useful for the functioning of the plan.

Without any doubt, Germany could have declared a moratorium. But formalities would have been necessary which would have offered us certain guaranties, delays, proportion of payments, verification of the financial state of Germany, proposal of experts. A committee would be charged with examining the condition of Germany; conditions were provided, after the suspension of transfers, for the future moratorium of payments, which could not be declared save at the end of one year and only for 50 per cent. The Young plan carried with it a certain number of considered conditions and possibilities, such as that of choosing as arbiter the court of The Hague, whose authority no one questions.

What is done with all these guaranties? We are told imperiously: "We will act and we beg you to act as if they did not exist. Put all your juridical work aside. We are making a proposal which dominates, to such an extent, all your laws, your procedures, and your arguments that it sweeps aside the given word, that it sweeps aside treaties and laws."

These manners are of a profound gravity. M. Dubois said that perhaps we would have to take upon ourselves not only the burden of the 2 milliards of new taxes, but would further have to pay out of our treasury the 3 milliards promised to the guaranty fund which we would be asked to pay to the Bank for International Settlements.

It is sufficient for Germany, looking ahead—as she said in her press yesterday—to proclaim in a few months the suspension of transfers in order that in one year, since she is not sure that the United States after the elections will permit her to obtain a second moratorium, she may obtain a moratorium of payments, because that is something she can not obtain until one year after having made use of the moratorium of transfers. It will be sufficient for her to declare the suspension of transfers in a few weeks for us to be obliged on the same day to pay, in conformity with the engagement which we have signed, the sum of 3 milliards. [Applause.]

Can we truly accept such charges and, above all, in international life ought such proceedings to be recommended?

I wish that, in general, the given word should be much more respected, the word solemnly given in international treaties, confirmed in the internal laws of different countries; but I wish indeed that what are called parliamentary prerogatives should also be respected, for, in our democracies, at least, it is the elected representatives of the people who, alone are sovereign. They have the true responsibilities. It is they who, finally, whether they are asked to accept them, as M. Laval announced, before entering into an engagement, or whether they are left with them afterwards, bear these responsibilities before their conscience, which is the essential thing, before history and before the body of electors. [Applause on the right and from various benches in the center.]

I have not the impression that the parliamentary prerogatives are respected by the proposal of President Hoover. They are not, certainly, as regards our country or Belgium; I will even—I call the attention of the President of the Council, to whom I might recall some very precise memories, to this point—say that they do not appear to be respected in what concerns the United States itself.

When M. Franklin-Bouillon, about a year ago, demanded that the United States should be asked to extend time for the payment of the stocks—that was also during vacation—Mr. Stimson replied to the dispatch from M. Briand in a moving manner.

Mr. Stimson said: "To refuse you in such circumstances seems to me very hard. I have French origins. I have done everything in order that my country should enter the war. I was among the first to enlist and I participated in the whole campaign of the American Army. But Congress alone is sovereign and its Members are at this moment dispersed. The President can, then, do nothing until Congress returns."

We bowed to the decision, but many of us thought that if an allied country or even an unfortunate country in any part of the world had had need of a vote from the French Chamber the President of the Chamber or the Government would not have done wrong in calling us back in very large numbers to discuss a serious question. [Lively applause.]

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, we have been greatly interested in the address of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN], which has just been concluded. We recognize his sincerity of purpose in the manner in which he has discussed this great subject before us. He several times—or certainly twice—in the course of his remarks said that his attitude on this question is governed by his conscientious desire to serve the best interests of this country. I directly differ with the gentleman as to what are the best interests of this country. In my opinion the best interests of the country are for him and the rest of us to vote for this debt-postponement bill before us here to-day.

This will serve the best interests of the country and not any effort to discredit our officials, which he has done both on this floor and before the Ways and Means Committee.

The gentleman was asked by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BEEDY] whether he had changed his mind or whether he had been of the same mind right along with reference to this matter and he passed the question by. He did not answer it man fashion at all, because he had in mind what the gentleman from Maine knew.

I hold in my hand a copy of the New York Daily Investment News, dated December 17, 1931. It is a signed article, evidently by the editor or by one of the important members of the staff of this daily paper, and I read:

Representative MCFADDEN'S attack in Congress on the President recalls an interview published in the Investment News a year ago, October 20—

The date that he referred to in his remarks, mind you—following my suggestion of a moratorium on reparations and war debts. Mr. MCFADDEN, who was requested by this paper to express his opinion on the subject of a moratorium, said, among other things: "A moratorium or downward revision of the present reparation payments under the Young plan is immediately necessary. Germany has given clear evidence of how difficult it is for her to pay, and the only relief seems to be in reduction of the amount of annuities or suspension."

Certainly he must have materially changed his opinion since then.

Mr. McFADDEN. There has been a material change in conditions since that time.

Mr. TREADWAY. I agree with my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania, there has been a great change, conditions are much worse than when the gentleman gave out his interview a year ago.

Mr. McFADDEN. And we have more definite knowledge——

Mr. TREADWAY. I agree with the gentleman that we have much more definite knowledge on the serious condition of the financial world from what it was a year ago. Since the gentleman gave out his interview conditions have changed materially for the worse.

There is another thing that I think should be definitely stated. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN] said that on December 9 and 10 the ambassador from France placed in the hands of Mr. Castle, the Under Secretary of State, an official document. I can say authoritatively on this floor that Mr. Castle, the Under Secretary of State on those dates had no interview with the French ambassador. Now, I will back that statement to the limit, and it is absolutely contrary to what the gentleman from Pennsylvania stated to the House.

Mr. McFADDEN. Was Mr. Castle called before the Committee on Ways and Means yesterday?

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Castle was called through his superior officer, and I am authorized to say on the word of the Secretary of State in accordance with the statement I have just made that Mr. Castle was interviewed by his superior, Secretary Stimson, and he will back what I say.

Mr. McFADDEN. I want to say that I have nothing to take back.

Mr. TREADWAY. No; because the gentleman is absolutely wrong. There is nothing to take back; there is nothing true about it. I am not saying that the gentleman from Pennsylvania intentionally places wrong information before the House, but I am saying that it is wrong. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER] called on the Secretary of State for information. The Secretary of State interviewed the Under Secretary and within 15 minutes was before our committee in executive session and repeated to us that Mr. Castle had told him just as he came to our committee room that he had had no communication on December 9 or 10 with the French ambassador or any representative of the French Government. I can not be more positive in a statement than that.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. As a matter of fact, Mr. Castle did not appear before the committee?

Mr. TREADWAY. He did not; we asked for his superior officer, and there was no occasion for Mr. Castle appearing.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Does not the gentleman recall that the Secretary of State called Mr. Castle over the telephone in the room and came back and said he had talked with Mr. Castle, and made the statement reported here?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Did not the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER], chairman of the committee, ask that Mr. Castle come before the committee?

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman may have suggested it, but if he will recall, I went from my end of the table down to the chairman and said to him that I thought we should ask the superior or head official either to appear or to direct the Under Secretary to come before us, and Mr. COLLIER thought that was the proper procedure. Am I not right in that?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I don't understand that Mr. COLLIER called Mr. Stimson. Mr. Stimson said that Mr. Castle had told him that he was not called.

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] says that we did not have the Franco-American agreement before us. I have a copy of it here in my hand. There is absolutely no change under the Franco-American agreement of July 6, as the result of the debt postponement; not the slightest. Get these two facts in mind. We are not a party in any sense to the Young agreement, and had nothing to do with it. That is a matter of German reparations. We had no hand in it. Still, the gentleman from Pennsylvania says we have changed it. There has not been the slightest change in the Young plan, and when I asked him to point out the changes before the Committee on Ways and Means he again dodged the question and failed to make an answer. In addition, he is very much confused about relations between international bankers, as he calls them, and our Government. Our Government, as such, has nothing whatever to do with the investments that the people may make in foreign countries or in this country. It is fortunate if at any period we have sufficient money so that our people can make investments. Just now we do not want them, but we can not control the use of American money with respect to where the owner of that money may see fit to invest it. It is impossible, and it has no relation whatsoever to the subject of this debt postponement.

I want now to make a brief reference to one remark of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN]. Mr. RANKIN admitted that, of course, it was ethically wrong for us to question the source of the information that the reporter of the Washington Post used in writing an article. He said positively that it came from official sources. We can trace no official source that it could have come from, and the article was incorrect. I hold in my hand the stenographic notes and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] said a few moments ago on this floor:

> They could have found out by calling a representative of either one of those embassies.

He refers there to the Committee on Ways and Means. I have listened to many speeches by the gentleman from Mississippi, and I shall not comment upon them, but what Member of this House for a moment thinks that any legislative body, this body or any committee thereof, can call before it as a witness a representative of any foreign embassy? It is the most absurd statement I ever knew a Congressman to make on this floor, that a committee of this House could call before it a representative of a foreign embassy. I can say authoritatively in that respect that if any representative of a foreign embassy so forgot his position in connection with his relations to his own government as to do such a thing as that, he would be immediately recalled by the home government.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. All the gentleman had to do would have been to propound that question and they could have conferred with their government and they would have given him the information.

Mr. TREADWAY. There is no way whereby any representative of a foreign government can have any direct communication with any legislative agency in this country.

Mr. RANKIN. If they conferred with their government, they could do it.

Mr. TREADWAY. They can only do business with us through the State Department, and that is where they have done it. The gentleman is absolutely wrong.

A good deal has been said here about insincerity of purpose. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] said in his testimony before our committee:

> I've seen through all my examination of these matters the dual position of the officers of our Government in all their relationship.

"Dual position." He thereby accuses, by innuendo, officials of this Government in high positions of saying one thing as representatives of the Government and doing another thing as representatives of investment houses in New York or elsewhere.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. TREADWAY. That is another innuendo that is not worthy of our consideration. I tried to quiz the gentleman on that and failed. Then he also said that—> the maneuvers which had been conducted by the State and the Treasury Departments in a field in which the Congress had the right and duty to participate tended to involve and have involved the United States Government in obligations from which it was free but which the allied governments were determined to impose upon it. There is no doubt that the State and Treasury Departments have deliberately withheld from the Congress of the United States information of foreign commitments which have been made and which under the Constitution required the consent of the Senate and the House.

Mr. Chairman, I can authoritatively deny that the State Department and the Treasury have ever made any such commitments or withheld any information from the Congress of the United States. On the contrary both departments have been most anxious to place every bit of available information in our hands. The statement I have quoted from the gentleman's testimony is absurd and without foundation in fact.

Before my time expires I want to compliment members of the majority of the Ways and Means Committee, particularly our new chairman, on the very nonpartisan and able manner in which he has carried on this very intricate subject, the first under his leadership as chairman. His speech this morning was a masterpiece in explanation, and when he and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] had finished their remarks, we could well have voted; but the committee wants the House to have all possible information within their power to provide. There has been no concealment, there has been no haste, absolutely none. The statement issued by the President of the United States on the 21st of June was notice to the world of what he expected to ask Congress to do at this time, and when gentlemen say there is usurpation of power, they should read the announcement made in the press of that date. Here are a few words from it:

Subject to confirmation by Congress.

That is in the very first paragraph.

In several other places in the course of that statement to the press the same thought appeared, that the President of the United States recognized the fact that it is only by confirmation of Congress that it would be possible to have this debt postponement put through.

Then, my friends, in closing I want to call attention to one outstanding feature of the statement of the President of that day:

I am suggesting—

He said—

to the American people that they be wise creditors in their own interest and be good neighbors.

Let us consider that sentence very carefully in this closing period of the debate.

In the interest of our own credit, and good neighbors that we want to be to the nations of the world.

That seems to me to be the heart and the essence of the President's interest and desire to promptly have this legislation passed. [Applause.]

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox].

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I have listened to this entire debate, and have reached the conclusion that we can not fail without serious dishonor to the Republic to pass this legislation. Other powers involved have acted upon the President's proposal, and for the Congress now to fail to adopt the resolution empowering the Secretary of the Treasury, with the consent of the President, to ratify this agreement would amount to impeachment of the good faith of the Government. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the handling of all international questions presents difficult and delicate problems. The President has been criticized for his failure to call Congress in session and obtain authority for moving in the premises. There is some merit, possibly, in that criticism, but, Mr. Chairman, we must visualize conditions as they existed at the time the proposal was made. The whole of Europe was in a chaotic condition, or at least almost. Germany was on the very brink of caving in. Great Britain was having her troubles. Delay would have been involved in assembling Congress in extra session. A crisis was on, and, therefore, in this emergency was to be found the justification for the President taking the initiative. I find nothing in the fact, if it be a fact, that representatives of Germany, official or otherwise, visited this country and counseled with the administration, including the President. I find nothing in the fact, if it be a fact, that officials of France or any of the other powers visited this country and counseled with the President or with others holding official positions in the Government. I say, Mr. Chairman, I find nothing in those circumstances that justifies the impeachment of the good faith of the President in making the proposal to all of the powers involved that there be a suspension in the collection of intergovernmental debts for the period of 12 months.

Mr. Chairman, I concede that there are surface arguments against the adoption of this resolution. In the settlements that were made a few years ago billions were sacrificed by our country. We have at the present time a terrible depression upon us. Want and hunger stalk in a naked state throughout the land. Our army of unemployed is being increased. Bread lines are being lengthened; but, Mr. Chairman, I take it that the motivating cause of the President proposing this resolution was in order to condition this country to the point that it might give direct and immediate treatment to these troublesome domestic problems upon our hands.

Will it be contended upon this floor, Mr. Chairman, that we could afford at the time to adopt a hands-off policy? Are not gentlemen candid enough to concede that we had an interest at stake? Does not the gentleman understand and appreciate the fact that the failure of Germany would have taken down with her possibly the whole of Europe, and that with the failure of these our creditor nations we would have taken liquidation on our foreign debt?

Do gentlemen not understand that this whole proposal was in the interest of world equilibrium and of world stability? Will not gentlemen concede, Mr. Chairman, that the actuating cause of the President was in order to strengthen our position or to improve the status of our claim as against foreign powers? Are there those here, Mr. Chairman, who are willing to make the assertion upon the floor of this House that the President was unmindful of the general welfare, and that his entire intent and purpose were to serve special groups, when the proposal of the moratorium was made?

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the hour presents to the membership of this House the necessity for an exhibition of the best statesmanship of which we are capable.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HAWLEY. May I ask the gentleman from Texas a question, for the convenience of Members? Does the gentleman intend to use all the time at his disposal?

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. We are going to use all the time. I have more requests than I can accommodate.

Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAY] five minutes.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, last June when I received the telegram of the President of the United States I thought seriously of the wisdom of his suggestion before I answered his telegram stating that at that time and as then advised I was inclined to go along in support of his proposition. I said, however, that I believed then, as I believe now, that conditions were such in this country that he should give his first attention to the American people.

I am not one of those who want to indulge in partisanship or make criticisms of the Chief Executive of my country, but I do believe that this is a question of greater moment than some of us apprehend.

I have no patience with the idea that the failure of this Congress to ratify the action of the President of the United States would result in disaster to this great country of ours.

When I wired the President that I felt conditions at home demanded more attention from the Government of the United States than conditions in Europe required, I was then studying about the system that had been resorted to which literally drained the pockets and the purses of the people of the United States, as by a suction pipe, into the money centers of this country and destroyed its business.

We were told by the Secretary of the Treasury, by the President of the United States, and by the report of the Federal Trade Commission as late as the middle of October, 1929, that the economic situation in the United States was fundamentally sound. Here in Washington was the Secretary of the Treasury, with his finger tips upon the wires connected directly with the stock exchange in Wall Street. Here in Washington were the records and facilities of the Federal Trade Commission. Here in Washington was the President of the United States, with direct communication and supervision of those two great agencies for obtaining information, and yet the American people were permitted to go on without advice, but upon the assurance from these sources that conditions were fundamentally sound; and the banker and the lawyer and the merchant and the farmer throughout this broad land of ours went down into their pockets and drew up their money that drifted through this great suction pipe of financial manipulations from Washington and New York into the great stock exchange, and the collapse came and our securities were gone and our resources destroyed and dissipated. To-day the same representatives of the American people who permitted that are the representatives who are demanding of the Congress of the United States that they ratify the arrangements made by the President with respect to this moratorium. [Applause.]

It has been appropriately said on the floor of this House, in the course of this debate, by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] that the American soldier won the war on the battlefields of France and in the Argonne; that Woodrow Wilson won the war at Versailles; and that President Hoover lost it in Washington. That is an appropriate expression of the situation.

Mr. Chairman, at this time I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD as a part of my remarks two editorials from a current issue of the Washington Post on the subject of intergovernmental debts which I think are pertinent to the matter under discussion.

WAR DEBTS WIPED OUT

It is unfortunate that the American public and the nations of Europe should have forgotten so soon the origin of what are now known as the "war debts." The cancellationists are anxious to have the world view these intergovernmental obligations as war debts. Europe furnished the men, they say, and America furnished the money to prosecute a common cause. Europe suffered a tremendous loss of human life. Why should money advanced by the United States for war purposes be repaid?

This appealing argument has no foundation in fact. In the first place, the United States has no responsibility for the European war. In the second place, the actual war debts of the allied nations to this Government have already been canceled. The Senate was given extensive details as to what the present European debts represent in an address by Senator MCKELLAR, which was generously punctuated by remarks from Senator SMOOT, a member of the World War Foreign Debts Commission. It is an indisputable fact that the debts incurred before the armistice were wiped out by the funding agreements.

France's debt amounted to $4,025,000,000, of which $1,655,000,000 represented postwar advances. The current value of the entire French-American settlement, at the rate of interest carried in France's existing obligations, is about $1,681,000,000. In the words of Secretary Mellon—

America has canceled the obligations of France for all advances during the war, and France in the Mellon-Berenger agreement has undertaken to repay only the advances and obligations subsequent to the armistice. No other creditor of France has accorded such generous treatment.

It should be recalled also that France purchased $2,000,000,000 worth of American goods which were in that country at the close of the war, paying only $407,000,000 for them. Even that ridiculously low figure was dumped into the general debt agreement and now passes under the category of "war debts."

With respect to Great Britain, a letter written by Secretary Mellon is enlightening. He says:

In the case of England, postarmistice advances with interest amounted to $660,000,000, and the present value of the entire debt settlement is $3,297,000,000. It must be remembered that England borrowed a large proportion of its debts to us for purely commercial as distinguished from war purposes—to meet its commercial obligations maturing in America, to furnish India with silver, to buy food to be resold to its civilian population, and to maintain exchange. Our loans to England were not so much to provide war supplies as to furnish sterling for home and foreign needs and to save England from borrowing from its own people.

Belgium's postarmistice borrowings, with interest amounted to $258,000,000, and the settlement was made at a current value of $192,000,000. Thus the Belgian people are paying to American taxpayers a good deal less than they borrowed after the war was over.

In the case of Italy, the cancellation of a purely commercial obligation is still more striking. Secretary Mellon's report shows that Italy received from the United States after the war closed $800,000,000, including interest. The settlement was made on a current value of $426,000,000. Almost half of the postwar debt was canceled.

Since the funding agreements were signed the war debts have passed out of the picture. Obligations now owed by European governments represent funds that were advanced for reconstruction, for the purchase of supplies, for the stabilization of European credit, and other commercial purposes. Cancellation of these debts, totaling $11,000,000,000, could in no way be considered a contribution on the part of the United States to the winning of the war but only an after-war gift to nations that now are unable or unwilling to pay their commercial obligations.

BOND JOBBERS

Two of the jobbers in questionable European "securities" have told the Senate Finance Committee that the banks which sponsored these loans now hold very small amounts of such paper. The great bulk of this depreciated paper is now held by American citizens, amounting to more than $6,000,000,000 in face value, and quoted in the market at less than half that figure.

The profits of the National City Bank in floating $1,071,000,000 of foreign bonds amounted to $13,392,402. The profits of Morgan & Co. were not disclosed. Mr. Lamont, a member of that firm, told the committee that he was mortified to admit that the profits had been contemptibly small. While the "gross spread" between the banker's inside price and the price exacted from the public seemed to be very large, in some cases as high as 8 per cent, there were so many middlemen bankers taking a slice of profit that Morgan & Co. made very little money and in some cases none at all. The bonds in some instances were floated purely out of a sense of duty.

The curse of international banking, like all other business, is that too many middlemen snatch off profits as the business passes through their hands. The international bankers are like the downtrodden farmer. If they could only sell their product direct to the consumer, they could make big profits. Obviously, it is the duty of Congress to set up a Federal bank board to stimulate cooperative selling by international bankers so that the greedy middleman can be eliminated. The bank board could buy up foreign bond issues when there is overproduction and hold them for a better market. Of course, the international bankers would be expected to do their share by cutting down production.

Since the banks have floated off this foreign paper it stands to reason that the banks are solvent. They have avoided the great mistake of holding this paper themselves. It is only the innocent purchaser who is insolvent.

From these editorials it will be seen that this Government has already gone to the limit as a philanthropist.

Mr. Chairman, I regret now to find myself unable to agree to the moratorium as proposed by the President, but I do not find it necessary, inasmuch as this is a nonpolitical question, to question the motives of the President of the United States; but, as a Member of the Congress and a representative of the American people, I have a right to question the judgment of the President and his advisors, and upon that ground alone I find myself compelled to oppose the resolution as reported by the Committee. I concede that the President, Secretary of State, and other high officials of the administration have been and are in better position than the Members of this House to know all of the facts connected with the initiation of this move, and all of the details of whatever negotiations may have transpired between this Government and the governments of Europe, and likewise they are in position to know and do know more about the promoters of the scheme than do the Members of this House; and when the President suggested in his message that the moratorium be given first and foremost attention by the Congress, that it be expedited and passed without delay, he should have submitted a report giving to the Congress the information which he no doubt has available through the State Department and the Department of the Treasury, and thereby would have probably relieved himself of many of the criticisms that have been made on the floor of this House. But he chose not to do so, and when we come here and find that a member of his own party, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN], who for the last decade has enjoyed the confidence and trust of his own party, including the President, Secretary of the Treasury, and other officials of the Government high in authority in financial and diplomatic circles, and who, during the entire 10 years last past has been Republican chairman of the powerful Committee on Banking and Currency and in position to know and understand the multitudinous ramifications and doings of the Treasury and Federal reserve system, and when he boldly charges that the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury are in secret alliance with like banking interests denominated by him as international bankers of Germany, Austria-Hungary, and other foreign nations to do hurt to the American Government and the American people, how can the Members of this House afford to support this proposal in view of the further fact that the Committee on Ways and Means have reported this bill to-day and the House has never yet been permitted to see even the slightest evidence heard by the committee, none of that evidence having been even written up, but a demand is made here that the resolution be passed without delay, and even an effort has been made on the floor of this House to limit debate thereon.

Although it is a question effecting the entire American people and every taxpayer in this land, we are told that it must pass before adjournment on this day. This, together with the fact that the gentlemen of the committee, Members of this House, who make the minority report, tell us in the report and in argument here that witnesses connected with the State Department and the agents of the powerful banking interests of Wall Street, refuse to divulge information to the committee and shelter behind the privilege accorded to the agent or representative of a principal, I still find myself unable to support the moratorium, notwithstanding the claimed stabilizing effect of the passage of the resolution is urged by the proponents of the resolution.

It is still within the minds of the American people, that it was Germany that provoked and brought on the World War, the greatest catastrophe in all history, and for which this country was in no sense responsible, and they still remember that the Von Hindenburg who cabled the President of the United States June 20 that Germany was in a desperate financial condition and needed the backing of the American Government, and a moratorium on the payment of its debts, is the same Von Hindenburg that formed a steel ring almost around the city of Paris in March, 1918, and pushed it forward with Germany artillery, poison gas, and every instrumentality of death conceivable to the human mind in an effort to destroy a world civilization and the same Hindenburg whose vicious grasp upon the west front was broken by the American doughboy at the expense of the lives of thousands upon thousands of the youth of our land, and yet the President in his message favors the moratorium and objects to the Congress extending any further financial relief to the ex-service men. In his message, he said:

> There will be demands for further veterans' legislation; there are inequalities in our system of veterans' relief; it is our national duty to meet our obligations to those who have served the Nation. But our present expenditure upon these services now exceeds $1,000,000,000 per annum. I am opposed to any extension of these expenditures until the country has recovered from the present situation.

And yet he says, "Give Germany a chance," when in truth and reality, if the charges made against him by the gentlemen of Pennsylvania are true, he is trying to give the international bankers of Austria, Germany, England, and France a chance. I, for one, feel that charity should begin at home, and so long as we have seven millions of the toilers of this Nation tramping the streets of the great cities and strolling the highways of the land in search of employment, so long as we hear the cry of twenty millions of their dependent women and children pleading for bread, so long as we have the farmers of America, burdened with mortgages upon their homes, their surplus crops without market and rotting in the fields, their farms being sold by multiplied thousands, so long as banks throughout the length and breadth of this country of ours are toppling and falling, and multiplied thousands of depositors are denied their own money, just so long, I am opposed to granting moratoriums to the national bank of Austria and the Reichsbank of Germany. So long as this condition continues in my own country, I am not going to stand with folded arms and closed lips, and watch our vanishing economic freedom, and with it possibly our own political freedom march to a grave of plutocracy at the behest of the international bankers of the world, and not register my protest. It has been stated on the floor of this House by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] that the President and Treasurer of the United States, and perhaps the Federal Reserve Board, were in secret alliance with these international bankers, and a challenge has been issued by him for an investigation of the truth of his statements, and so far, no one has dared to accept his challenge, and so long as that challenge goes unanswered, I do not propose to vote against what I conceive to be the interests of my constituents and the American people. The plea is made here, and Members of this House, with pathetic cry and quivering voices, howl that a great calamity will befall the Nation if this resolution is not passed.

As stated, Mr. Chairman, I have no fears as to the ultimate outcome of the present economic situation in this country, yet I know that great sacrifices and untold suffering has been and must continue to be the price paid for economic freedom of our own people, and still I can look through the misty haze of overwhelming misfortune, and see the sunlight beyond the clouds.

This Nation, following the wisdom of Washington, who in its early existence warned against foreign alliances, has pushed forward from a few struggling colonies to the most powerful and richest Nation upon the face of the earth; it has passed through panics and depressions in the past; it survived the terrible ordeal of 4 years of terrific civil war and 10 years of reconstruction thereafter, and from a divided, rent, and torn war-stricken country it came out of the most terrible economic and social disaster in all history. From 1860 to 1870 was a decade of blood and tears, and yet the great French hero, Clemenceau, speaking of the conditions that existed at the close of the reconstruction period that followed the Civil War, and expressing his confidence in the ultimate wisdom and success of our form of government, said:

> Thus on every hand political and social difficulties arise. But the people of the United States have a peculiar faculty for adjusting themselves to circumstances and learning by experience, suddenly changing their course and thus nearly always disappointing prophets of disaster. The Americans will make mistakes, but they will quickly find out how to remedy them. They will lose their way temporarily among the problems which beset them, trying out and abandoning unsatisfactory solutions, but in the end, when truth and justice have taken some kind of shape and revealed themselves to the eyes of the world, the people will seize upon them. So we must reserve our judgment for a time. For the present I will do no more than indicate the fluctuations of public opinion. The events of the last four years have taught me never to give up hope for this country.

I, Mr. Chairman, like the Tiger of France, believe that the events of the past have taught us never to give up hope for this country.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] has produced in this Chamber records showing that out of funds collected through the forbearance of the country the Republic of Germany has loaned to Soviet Russia hundreds of millions of dollars, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] has told us of a visit to Berlin and of the terrible street demonstrations of the Russian reds, and I doubt not that his statements are true, and if they are, then I am opposed to granting a moratorium to the European nations, and particularly to Germany, to allow them to keep the money of the American taxpayer and loan it to Russia to support a soviet system of communism. Yes, Mr. Chairman, the plan is to extend a moratorium to Germany, while German bankers and German interests furnish money to Soviet Russia, with whom we have no diplomatic intercourse and who to-day would tear down and forever destroy the American flag.

Ah, gentlemen, we may have bread lines and soup houses throughout the length and breadth of this land, but not within the memory of any man in this House until the opening day of this session of this Congress have we beheld such a spectacle as we saw in the great Capital City of our country at the very hour when this Congress was administering the oath of office to the Speaker of this House. Before the Capitol, within the walls of which this Congress was organizing to legislate for the American people, stood an armed wall of hundreds of Washington policemen to prevent the entry of 1,500 jobless and hungry American citizens, admitted by the president of the American Federation of Labor to be the emissaries of communism, and yet men on this floor will vote a moratorium to Germany, while Germany loans American money to Soviet Russia and Soviet Russia in turn fosters and breeds communism in secret places throughout the length and breadth of this great country of ours. For my part I should rather vote for a substantial appropriation to the Department of Justice for the purpose of stamping out communism in America. In the face of a deficit in our own Treasury of more than a billion dollars and with that deficit climbing by leaps and bounds, the Congress of the United States is asked to forego the collection of its foreign debts. I would remind my colleagues on both sides of this Chamber that the United States Government never owned a dollar or a dollar's worth of property but what was collected by the drastic method of taxation, laid in hundreds of thousands of instances upon the tattered backs of the toiling masses of this country. It is money that we propose to give to Germany, earned by the hand of toil.

Since this debate began, I motored to the great national shrine of Mount Vernon and stood beside the still waters of the Potomac at the voiceless tomb of Washington. In awe, sacred reverence, and retrospect, I stood with bowed head before the sacred sarcophagus of the Father of our Country, and my mind went back to the dreary winter days of Valley Forge, when the heroes of the revolution, hungry and ill-clad, walked with bleeding feet upon the frozen fields of Valley Forge to found this Republic, and then, too, I thought of the dark days of 1917 and 1918, when our boys, with a gallantry and heroism unequaled in all history marched beneath the Stars and Stripes, through the terrors of shot, shell, and death, across No Man's Land, into the very jaws of death, to save that which Washington had given to us as the rich heritage of a free people.

So long, Mr. Chairman, as the memories of those days live with me I can not vote for this moratorium to European Governments. Until our veterans have been paid their adjusted-service certificates, and until we can bring back to the American home owner in his humble cottage upon the mountain side and in the valley, upon the farm and in the city and village the inspiration of the immortal John Howard Payne's Home Sweet Home, I shall not vote for this moratorium. [Applause.]

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON] such time as he may desire.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, it would be an imposition to take the time at this late hour sufficient to make the argument I had in mind in opposition to the pending measure. I have abundant reasons for opposing the moratorium purporting to delay for one year the debts due America by the German Government, but which, in my opinion, is a positive opening wedge for absolute and ultimate cancellation.

Surely there is no one on either side of the aisle, nor is there a Member of this House, who would refuse to vote for the pending bill if given positive assurance that the measure meant what it pretends. I have listened attentively to this debate for almost a week, and so far as I recall no proponent of the measure has had the temerity to say that the bill, if and when passed—for the die is cast, your promises have been given, and it is conceded the bill will pass—will solve the economic situation or actually give the desired relief to Germany. Is there any Member of this House who will say that one year's postponement of Germany's debt to America will solve Germany's problem? Do you proponents of this bill believe that if Germany is unable to pay now she will be more able to pay her increased debt 12 months from now? Will any Member show his good faith and courage by arising here and saying that he does not know Germany will ask for another extension one year from now? And is there anyone here who believes that Germany will not get that extension? Then when Germany is granted her request is it not a foregone conclusion that other foreign governments will demand the same?

A few minutes ago the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] made a strong appeal for the passage of this bill; but is occurs to me that the gentleman, who is usually logical in his argument, was inconsistent when he admitted that the President acted without authority in committing this Government to a moratorium without the consent of Congress and then begged this Congress to stand by the President.

The gentleman from New York read into the RECORD many statements from Members of this House committing themselves to the moratorium. He did not read my statement. When the President made his famous but, I grant, unwitting surrender to the international bankers last June, after many of those leading bankers from New York had camped some three or four days at the Treasury in conference with Secretary Mellon, and wires went forth from the White House to Members of both Houses of Congress inviting a pledge to the so-called 1-year postponement plan, I did not make any rash promises. I did not surrender then, even though my first impulse was to follow the President if possible to do so. In my reply I told the President that I would not oppose the moratorium, provided, among other things, I was convinced it would not lead to ultimate cancellation, which I was afraid then, and am convinced now, this so-called 1-year holiday actually means.

During all this extended debate the burden of the argument from the Republican side of this aisle has been a plea to "stand by the President"; that has been their hue and cry. Why, Mr. Chairman, I have been amazed to hear several Republican leaders compare this moratorium with the World War. It has been especially amusing to hear gentlemen on the Republican side speak with such emotion and deep feeling in their eloquent pleas to "stand by the President," who a few days ago turned their backs on the President by relegating to the ranks their distinguished and able leader from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON], who is generally known to be the closest man in Congress to the Chief Executive. I am only too glad to stand by the President when I believe him to be right, but so long as I remain a Member of this body I shall not hesitate to oppose the President when I know him to be wrong. [Applause.]

Since I have been a Member of Congress I have attended two important peace conferences in Europe as one of the representatives of this body. I have traveled all over Germany and many of the other nations of the Old World. It has not been many months since I went up the beautiful Rhine River from Mainz to Coblenz. With few exceptions I received more cordial treatment in Germany than in any nation in Europe. I personally have no ill feeling toward Germany nor the German people; they are thrifty, progressive, and ambitious. But it has been amusing to me to hear colleagues on this floor plead so appealingly for poverty-stricken Germany, many of whom have never placed their feet on German soil and know surprisingly little of conditions there. It is true that financial conditions are bad in Germany, but it is also true that they are critical in America. I say without fear of contradiction that conditions of the farmers of Germany are not as deplorable as are those of the farmers of the district I represent in Oklahoma. The great Rhine River is at this moment literally filled and jammed with seagoing and lighter cargoes, and the thousands of smokestacks up and down the Rhine are literally belching forth black smoke, showing that industries of Germany are not at a standstill, as some would have you believe.

Permit me to remind you that this is not the first so-called moratorium that has been brought to this Congress for consideration. When I first came to Congress I recall that this body was confronted with a measure proposing to grant France one year's additional time to pay for certain war materials she had purchased from the United States at 10 cents on the dollar. You will recall that when the World War closed we had $2,000,000,000 worth of war materials in Europe that France needed. France struck a bargain with America and bought those materials, consisting of overcoats, raincoats, shoes, guns, ammunition, tractors, and war materials of every kind, including groceries and supplies, at 10 cents on the dollar. France promised to pay in full for these materials in one year's time, but, of course, made no effort to pay. She came to Congress and asked for a moratorium of one year and was given extension of time by this big-hearted, generous Government.

A year later France again sent her emissaries to Congress and again her request was granted. Year after year since then France has called on the Congress of the United States and year after year this debt has been extended. France and other foreign governments have found this Government of ours so generous that all Europe looks upon us as a big-hearted Santa Claus. Europe knows Uncle Sam is "easy." None of the foreign nations, save possibly England, has the slightest thought of paying the balance of its debt to America. And to the American who happens to be in Europe, representatives of those governments and citizens generally make fun of your Government and mine for being so easy. And all agree that they do not propose to pay, and do not have to pay, their debts to this Government. "Finis la guerre" (the war is over) is the only argument or excuse given for Europe's attitude to America.

If you will examine the RECORD you will find that almost the identical argument that has been made on this floor to-day and for the past week in favor of this alleged one year's postponement, was made by some of the same leaders here a few years ago in favor of cancellation of a major portion of war debts due America by other nations. Be it remembered that 51 per cent of the French debt and 74 per cent of the Italian debt was canceled in order that America might show her brotherly love and play the part of the Good Samaritan to those supposedly impoverished nations. We were also told that it would be a valuable aid in helping France and Italy to prosper, and that their prosperity would be indirectly reflected in America, and that our magnanimity to France and Italy would mean a revival of business in the United States. Congress was also assured that France and Italy were to reduce their armaments of war. Both nations prospered to considerable extent by our overgenerous move, and neither nation felt obligated to keep faith with America. Did trade with either France or Italy improve? No. Both nations went across to the cut-rate store—Russia—and began buying their cotton, their wheat, and other supplies that they were morally obligated to buy from the United States. Did either nation reduce its armaments of war? Oh, no; but, on the other hand, both France and Italy have decidedly increased their standing armies, their navies, and increased their appropriations for aircraft. In short, France and Italy took Uncle Sam, the big-hearted Santa Claus, on a "snipe hunt" and left him holding the sack.

The pending bill, stripped of the silly, maudlin sentiment, camouflage, and misinformation, resolves itself into one simple question, as I see the picture: Will Uncle Sam be taken on another snipe hunt by another foreign government and be left holding the sack? [Applause.]

In conclusion, permit me to compliment the all-powerful Ways and Means Committee for adding section 5 to the bill, even though it is almost a meaningless section. It is a short and extremely mild statement of policy, giving notice to the Old World that the pending measure, when passed, does not necessarily mean that Congress has adopted a policy of absolute cancellation. It is a beautiful little gesture, and gives those of you who, on the spur of the moment, promised the President to support this bill, at least one leg to stand on in your protestations to your constituents that you are really opposed to ultimate cancellation. But, Mr. Chairman, I can not in good conscience support the moratorium, because I am fully convinced that it is not a one year's postponement we are voting on here to-day, but full and absolute cancellation. Be not deceived; you are simply lifting these debts from the shoulders of Europe and transferring them to the already weary backs of our American taxpayers of to-day as well as those of generations yet to come. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert two resolutions, one by the Bill Murray Club, of El Reno, Okla., and another by the American Legion, of Lawton, Okla.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, under the leave granted me I am inserting in the RECORD a resolution adopted unanimously by the Murray Club, of El Reno, Okla., in the district I have the honor to represent in Congress, and composed of several hundred members. I am advised that this resolution was passed unanimously and, I feel, represents the sentiment of citizens generally in the sixth congressional district of Oklahoma, irrespective of political affiliations. I concur heartily in the sentiment expressed therein.

The resolution is as follows:

Resolution

Whereas Andrew Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury of the United States of America, has forwarded to Congress a demand on that body to pass legislation raising the taxes on small incomes and inheritances and lowering the exemptions that now exist;

Whereas said proposed legislation, as set forth in the plan and demand of Secretary Mellon, raises the tax on small incomes approximately 700 per cent and raises the tax on large incomes of $50,000 or more less than 20 per cent; and

Whereas said Secretary Mellon has announced that he will soon submit a bill for the approval of Congress establishing a moratorium or cancellation of war loans made to foreign countries;

Whereas it is the opinion of the Murray Club, of Canadian County, Oklahoma, that said proposed tax is inequitable and unfair to the persons earning small incomes, and it is further the opinion of the Murray Club that the cancellation of debts owing by foreign countries is an act in favor of the big international banking interests, the burden and cost of which must be borne by the taxpayers of America, and it being further the opinion of the Murray Club that taxes should now be lowered instead of raised, and that European countries should be called upon to pay their honest debts of war: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the Murray Club of Canadian County, Okla., That we condemn and recommend for disapproval the plan, bill, or demand of Secretary Mellon made to the American Congress known as the so-called income tax bill; be it further

Resolved, That we condemn and recommend for disapproval the passage of any bill creating a moratorium or the further cancellation in any amount of war debts owing by European countries; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be mailed to honorable Senator THOMAS P. GORE, honorable Senator ELMER THOMAS, and to the honorable Congressman JED JOHNSON.

CLYDE MATTHEWS, President.

Attest:

SIDNEY CLUTE, Secretary.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I also insert in the RECORD a resolution adopted by Lowery Post, No. 29, American Legion, Lawton, Okla., in the district I have the honor to represent in Congress, and composed of several hundred members. I am advised that this resolution was passed unanimously, and I concur heartily in the sentiment expressed therein.

The resolution is as follows:

Resolution

Whereas it is our belief that the action taken by delegates in attendance at the national convention, American Legion, September 21 to 24, 1931, at Detroit, Mich., in voting down the resolution calling for the immediate payment by the Government to veterans of the World War the balance due them on their adjusted-compensation certificates does not conform with the desires and needs of the membership of the American Legion at large throughout the United States who were unable to attend this convention and who depended on their own delegates to represent them at the convention, for the reason that delegates representing certain State departments that had already indorsed the final payment of adjusted certificates at their own State department conventions, and who had instructions to carry on through the national convention, did not follow instructions, but cast their votes against the resolution due to certain outside influences brought to bear beginning three days prior to and continuing through the convention until the question was defeated. This assertion is verified by the fact the following State departments had previously gone on record in their State conventions demanding the final payments of adjusted-compensation certificates:

(a) California, with a strength of 71 votes, cast 53 against it.
(b) Massachusetts, with a strength of 65 votes, cast 26 against it.
(c) Michigan, with a strength of 35 votes, cast 13 against it.
(d) Ohio, with a strength of 36 votes, cast 22 votes against it.

And there is no doubt but that a number of other State departments did the same as these four. This makes a total of 114 unauthorized votes that were cast against the resolution that should have been cast for it that are known of; and which, if deducted from the 902 votes counted against it and added to the 507 votes cast for it, would change the vote to 621 for and 788 against, not considering other departments on whom we do not have figures; and

Whereas there is no doubt but that this flagrant violation of instructions on the part of hundreds of delegates attending the convention was brought about by the presence and influence created during the convention by high ranking Government officials and politicians who have opposed each and every plan that has been conceived for the adjustment of the soldier's compensation. President Hoover had declined invitations extended by the national commander American Legion and the mayor of Detroit to honor the convention and the city of Detroit with his presence. But three days prior to the convention, and after a 4-hour conference with the Secretary of the United States Treasury, Mr. Andrew W. Mellon, who is possibly one of the most radical opponents to any financial aid to the soldier, Mr. Hoover finally accepted the invitations. Only two days prior to the opening of the convention the Detroit newspapers carried this headline: "Mr. Mellon insistent that President Hoover attend the American Legion convention." The methods used and the organization gathered together was possibly the strongest and most perfect ever before used at any convention, for in addition to using the powerful influence of the President of the United States, it was augmented by the addition of Col. Hanford McNider, a past national commander of the American Legion, and who now holds the high position of United States minister to Canada; Col. Theodore Roosevelt, Governor of Porto Rico; and Gen. Frank Hines, Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau, Washington, D. C., all of whom, it will be noted, are holders of high appointive positions, which are under control of the most serious opponents to settlement of an obligation which the Congress of the United States confessed judgment by the act of 1924; and

Whereas the high majority, and possibly as many as 90 per cent of the membership of the American Legion scattered throughout the great width and breadth of those United States, who were not financially able to attend such an elaborate convention as was held at Detroit, Mich., desire an opportunity to express their desires and wishes in the matter of the Government, who has been so liberal with foreign countries, war contractors, railroads, and all the other big industries in adjusting their war claims, meeting this obligation without further delay: Now, therefore be it

Resolved, That Lowery Post, No. 29, Department of Oklahoma, American Legion, in regular assembly at Lawton, Okla., December 3, 1931, hereby request the next United States Congress to enact the necessary laws so as to permit the payment of adjusted compensation now due the veterans of the World War, as has been confessed by the Government as being due these soldiers since 1925; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be spread in the minutes of this meeting, a copy mailed to each and every American Legion post in the Department of Oklahoma, a copy to at least one outstanding American Legion post in each State in the United States, with the request that they circularize every American Legion post within their respective States, and a copy to each congressional Senator and Representative representing the State of Oklahoma in the United States Congress with the request that they use their best efforts toward securing for some 3,580,000 veterans of the World War who are in urgent need of this financial assistance at this time.

GEO. W. MCMILLAN,
Committee Chairman.
A. Z. WILLIFORD,
Committee Member.
WM. C. ELLER,
Committee Member.

Presented and adopted at regular meeting of Lowery Post, No. 29, American Legion, Department of Oklahoma, this 3d day of December, 1931.

ANDREW CROSBY,
Post Commander.

Official:

GEORGE WILLIAMS,
Post Adjutant.

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES].

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, I rise to protest the adoption of House Resolution 147, to postpone the payment of the bonded indebtedness due the United States from foreign governments during the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1931. I am opposed to this resolution, because it means the ultimate cancellation of the war debts. We may undertake to deceive ourselves by false logic and assurances that this is a temporary postponement, but in my humble judgment it is the end of the war debt. If this is not the end of the war debt, or the first initial move that will eventually lead to the cancellation of war debts, then why did the President in his message to Congress recommend the reestablishment of the Debt Funding Commission? What possible purpose could this commission serve other than to cancel the debts, in whole or in part? If the administration is sincere in its statement that it is opposed to the cancellation of foreign indebtedness owing to America, the creation of this Debt Funding Commission would be a useless and expensive act without the possibility of any resulting advantages.

If this proposed moratorium is not the first move leading to cancellation, then why did Ramsay MacDonald, the greatest political leader in England and possibly in Europe, say during his campaign, in substance—that the moratorium, thank God, ended all foreign debts, and never again will our people—those of the English nation or those of any other country in Europe—be troubled with the payment of the debts that have been asserted to be due from those countries unto the United States of America.

Not only did Ramsay MacDonald utter these views, but many other statesmen in Europe made similar statements.

But, Mr. Chairman, why deceive ourselves or the American people with the delusion of hope. This whole scheme of a moratorium was conceived by international bankers for the purpose of putting priority upon their claims against Germany and of subordinating the claim of the people of the United States of America. These international bankers have loaned $3,000,000,000 to Germany, and they feel that they can not collect this tremendous sum if our Government insists upon the payment of the indebtedness due it. They therefore wish to saddle upon the overburdened shoulders of our taxpayers this tremendous sum of $11,000,000,000 owing us by foreign nations.

Mr. Chairman, the undisputed evidence adduced upon the hearing before the Ways and Means Committee shows that not one of our debtor nations requested this moratorium. Germany, the one who it is claimed will be most benefited, did not request it. The President, acting on his own initiative and in a sumptuary and unconstitutional manner, proposed this moratorium at a time when our debtors were making preparation to pay us the $252,000,000 due on the 15th of June, this year.

If the President of the United States believed that this moratorium was necessary and advisable, why did he not follow the constitutional requirement and summon Congress in extraordinary session to pass upon this far-reaching proposal? He could have assembled Congress within two or three days, and the representatives of the people would have been given an opportunity to weigh and consider the matter and act in behalf of the American people. A special session of Congress would not have cost the American people any more, because the salaries of the Congressmen go on just the same whether they are in session or not. But evidently the international bankers feared a special session of Congress. They feared the investigation and disclosures that were inevitable.

There is not a scintilla of evidence before this House indicating that our foreign debtors desired or needed a moratorium. Of course, we are not granting the moratorium to Germany. We are granting a moratorium to France, who is the most prosperous country on the face of the globe at the present time. France has very little unemployment, and is maintaining the strongest military forces ever known in the history of her country. We are granting a moratorium to England who owns the greatest empire on the face of the globe.

We did not participate in the debt settlement between Germany and the European nations with which she was engaged in war. We repeatedly stated that the money the Allies borrowed from us was in no way linked with the money owing by Germany to the Allies. Within the past six months Germany paid $230,000,000 to international bankers, and yet we are asked to step aside and permit the bankers to collect the sums due them and saddle this tremendous burden upon the American people and their children's children. Others may hesitate, others may procrastinate, but as for me, Mr. Chairman, I shall protest this outrageous proposal with all the force at my command and as long as I am privileged to serve in this great body.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that we have been exceedingly generous to our foreign creditors. After the war America canceled every war debt owing to her by her Allies; but not content with this generous action—which I would not have supported had I been in Congress at that time—there are those who insist that we cancel the commercial debts—money loaned for the purpose of rehabilitating those countries. Some of these countries even used our money for paying cash bonuses to their soldiers, and in building up great armies and navies, and even for lending money to other nations to build up armaments. According to the statement of Secretary Mellon, America canceled the obligations of France for all advances during the war, and France only undertook to repay the advances and obligations subsequent to the armistice.

This Government canceled Italy's debt, and then virtually divided the postarmistice debt in half and arranged for her to pay the last half of the postarmistice debt in 62 years. The same was true in regard to Serbia. We not only canceled Belgium's war debt but we canceled sixty-six millions of her after-the-war debt. The Debt Funding Commission pared down more than 50 per cent of the foreign indebtedness owing to us. The money that was obtained for making these loans and advances to our allies during the war and after the war was through the issuance of Government bonds which were sold to our citizens. We must collect this money through taxation from our people.

Mr. Chairman, in dealing with this question, we must remember that we are not dealing with our own property; we are acting as the trustees of the American people, and we do not have the moral right to saddle this indebtedness upon the overburdened shoulders of the American taxpayers and their children's children.

Mr. Chairman, the proposal of the moratorium by President Hoover evidently did not relieve the situation in Germany. After the announcement of the moratorium Germany was compelled to put an embargo upon the exportation of gold and to resort to the most arbitrary and energetic measures to prevent her financial collapse. It is true that after the announcement of the proposed moratorium there was a temporary advance in stocks, bonds, and securities, but this was due to the belief on the part of international bankers that America would consent to a complete cancellation of the foreign indebtedness. When, however, it became manifest that the great majority of American people were vigorously opposed to such cancellation, the stocks and bonds sank to a lower level than ever before.

Under the Young reparation plan Germany had the right, when it was unable to pay, to postpone her debts for three years; but she did not take advantage of this provision contained in every contract that she had made. Why, then, was it necessary for the President to take the initiative in this matter and invite our creditors not to pay us? If Germany was unable to pay, she had the right to apply to the Bank for International Settlements and to obtain a postponement of the indebtedness; but, despite this remedy, President Hoover, in a moment of great generosity and deep concern for Europe, took the initiative and extended to our creditors an invitation not to pay us.

Mr. Chairman, I am disgusted with that maudlin sentiment that is continually urging us to save Europe. It seems to me that it is high time for us to save America. For the past 15 years we have been engaged in the business of saving Europe; we have poured billions of dollars into the treasuries of Europe and enabled them to build up their industries and agriculture at the expense of the American people. We are now faced with a $2,000,000,000 deficit in our own Treasury. Seven millions of our fellow citizens are walking the streets in idleness, unable to secure the means of earning a decent livelihood. Our farmers have been reduced to despair.

On account of the enactment of the Smoot-Hawley law by the Republican administration our export trade has been reduced to a minimum. In 1920 our foreign exports amounted to the enormous sum of $8,100,000,000, and under the present law our exports have diminished to $3,843,-180,000 in 1930. We therefore no longer have foreign markets in which to sell our surplus agricultural products. This in a large measure accounts for the fact that the farmers' products have fallen to the lowest price level in many years. The records of the Department of Agriculture show that it cost our farmers on an average of 89 cents per bushel to produce corn in 1930. The same year it cost them $1.09 a bushel to produce wheat, and from 50 to 54 cents a bushel to produce oats. According to the same records, it cost our cotton farmers 16 cents per pound to produce cotton in 1930. The production cost for these products will be about the same for 1931, according to many authentic statements that have been made. This fall corn sold for prices ranging from 25 to 30 cents a bushel; wheat as low as 25 cents a bushel; oats 15 cent a bushel, and cotton as low as 4 cents a pound in the lint.

In spite of this deplorable condition that prevails throughout our agricultural section, in spite of the general bankruptcy of businesses and industries dependent on agriculture, we are asked to postpone the foreign indebtedness owing to us in order to give the international bankers a chance to collect their loans. Thousands of farmers are losing their farms through foreclosures of mortgages.

Millions of dollars are due the Federal land banks on farm land and the land banks will probably foreclose their liens and sell the homes of many farmers for a mere song. To-morrow we will consider House bill 6172, which proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to subscribe to the capital stock of Federal land banks to the aggregate amount of $100,000,000. Although I believe that this bill is wholly inadequate to relieve the distressful condition that prevails among our farmers, still I am going to vote for it because I am assured by our leaders that it is the best that we can get. However, our distinguished colleague from Oklahoma, Congressman McKEOWN, will offer an amendment to this bill which will direct the Federal land bank to grant delinquent farmers a moratorium for one year in which to pay their indebtedness due the Federal land banks and save their homesteads from foreclosure. I now predict that the majority of those who are now urging us to grant a moratorium to foreign nations will vote against a moratorium in favor of our farmers. As for me, Mr. Chairman, I will vote for a moratorium in favor of our farmers, but I will never consent to a moratorium in favor of Europe, unless I am convinced by impartial evidence that our creditors are unable to pay us.

We have come to a sad pass in this country, when those in control of the Government are willing to extend aid to Europe which they withhold from their own fellow countrymen. We could be lenient with France, so that she would not have to pay us the $50,000,000 that she owes this year and so that she could spend $547,133,935 on increasing her armament.

Great Britain could not pay the $159,520,000 due us, but she could spend $608,240,880 on armament. Belgium could not pay the $7,950,000 on the money she owed us, but she had no trouble raising the $23,247,347 she spent on armament. We could not inconvenience Italy by requiring her to pay us $14,647,000 due us on the debt, but the administration saw no inconsistency in her action in spending $332,-237,000 on increasing armaments. Our sympathy was so sincere and deep that we could not bear the thought of Rumania paying us the $800,000 that she owed us on a debt. But no one protested her action in spending $67,-610,000 for implements of war. Thus we relieved these foreign debtors for a year by the moratorium of the payment of $252,000,000 on the loans that came from the pockets of the American people, but they could and did have no trouble and no embarrassment in spending $1,779,346,162 for armament.

Mr. Chairman, I beseech the President of the United States to withdraw his eyes from Europe and focus them on our own country. Let him envision the spectacle of woe, hunger, and despair that may be seen in every section of our Nation—the gaunt hand and shrunken cheek of poverty; the pale, emaciated faces of little children; the black despair reflected in the eyes of bearded men; the drooped shoulders and faltering steps of mothers, who have tramped the streets or searched the garbage cans in vain for food with which to lessen the pangs of hunger that gnaw at the stomachs of their babes. Let him consider the deplorable plight of the farmer, who is reduced to the necessity of selling the products of his labor and toil below the cost of production. For a long time the Republican administration and the "inner circle" ignored the honest claims of the farmers. What mattered it to them whether or not the farmer shared in the distribution of economic prosperity; what did they need with the farmer? Drunk with prosperity and rioting in extravagance and indulgencies similar to the last days of Rome, the superrich realized too late that agricultural prosperity is essential to industrial and financial prosperity. The patient and uncomplaining farmer was made to pay $500,000,000 a year in tariff tribute in order that the favored and privileged classes might increase their swollen fortunes. The farmer was made to bear the burden of taxation and he was expected to stand uncomplainingly by while his home was sold under the hammer, and the savings of a lifetime were wiped out.

The farmer did not expect nor demand favors from the Government; all he asked was a fair return upon his investment and labor; all he expected was equality of economic opportunity; all he asked was that if he should continue subject to the laws and conditions of competition, the other groups and classes in our economic life should be subjected to the same laws and conditions. He did object to the unfairness which required him to buy in a protected market and sell in an unprotected market in competition with the cheap pauper labor of Egypt and India and other countries. He did object to paying high prices for the necessities that he required, but compelled to sell his product for a mere song. He did object to having his property valued for taxable purposes above what he could procure for it upon the market while many groups of capital were able to conceal their assets in various ways. But his complaints were not heard by the administration, or if heard, they were little heeded. Then came the day of inevitable reckoning, the awful crash. Is there any wonder that in the collapse of agriculture there were involved the millions of citizens and thousands of enterprises directly dependent upon agriculture?

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that it is high time for us to heed the admonition of the fathers of this Republic and promote "peace, commerce, and good will with all nations, but entangling alliances with none." We have been in the saving business for the last 15 years. This business has cost us $40,000,000,000 out of the pockets of the American taxpayers. It has cost us the lives of many of our finest young men and it has bled the American people white.

Economic salvation, like charity, should begin at home. Although we should maintain good will and a cooperative spirit with the nations of the earth and endeavor by every legitimate way to promote the peace and happiness of mankind, yet we should avoid the serious blunder of entangling ourselves with the feuds, the quarrels, and the wars of Europe. I have been amazed at the argument of some of the gentlemen in favor of this moratorium. Some of them contend that we must go to the rescue of Germany to prevent Adolph Hitler from seizing the reins of government. In the name of common sense, have we reached that point in the affairs of this country that we must dictate to foreign nations the character of government that they must set up to administer their affairs? If we have come to this point, then we may as well prepare ourselves for endless wars in the future. Our best contribution to the general stability and happiness of mankind is to make our own country the shining example of peace, liberty, happiness, and prosperity. If the majority of the German people want Adolph Hitler, it is none of our business, and we should be content to administer our own affairs without interfering with those of other countries. This is the course recommended by the great men who founded this Nation. It is the only road that will lead to peace, liberty, and safety. [Applause.]

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. AMLIE].

Mr. AMLIE. Mr. Chairman, I have been tremendously impressed by the speech of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES]. I feel that the youngest Member of the House has made by far the best speech in opposition to the resolution that has been made in the course of this debate. [Applause.] I agree largely with what the gentleman has said, but, nevertheless, I am going to vote for the moratorium. [Applause.]

I am going to vote for the moratorium for this reason: It has been in effect for six months. It was entered into by and between the governments in Europe on the one side and the Government of the United States on the other, the President acting for the Government of the United States and having the support of various leaders of both Houses of Congress.

When this agreement was made, the people of these European governments had some right to assume that the President and Members of Congress had some authority to speak for the Government of the United States. They have gone ahead on the supposition that this is an actual agreement, and on the strength of that agreement they have made their plans for the next year.

I feel, therefore, that the Government of this country is in honor bound to fulfill the terms of that moratorium.

There is also the further fact that if a refusal to confirm the moratorium at this time should throw the European countries into financial chaos, they would charge this Government with bad faith and contend that, inasmuch as we had broken the agreement with them, they would be morally justified in breaking their agreement to pay us what is due and owing from them to the Government of the United States.

I wish, however, to protest against the manner in which this moratorium agreement was entered into by the President, without the consent and approval of the Congress of the United States. It is a dangerous precedent. The Executive can go so far in negotiations that the Congress will be placed in a dilemma if it attempts to do anything but confirm what the Executive has done.

I feel that unless the position of the Members of Congress is made definite and clear at this time, that some future President may definitely commit this country to a policy of complete cancellation of all foreign debts before Congress has had an opportunity to act. I believe that we had an excellent illustration of this situation 14 years ago, when the President of the United States as the Chief Executive to a large extent was responsible for creating a situation where Congress felt that there was nothing to do but recognize that a state of war existed and to declare war.

While I am not going to commit myself on any further moratorium proposals which may come before Congress in the proper manner, I am going to state that I will vote against any further moratoriums arranged for by the President without first giving Congress the opportunity to consider the matter. The principle involved is fundamental and can not be lost sight of, if Congress is to perform the duty for which it was created.

It has been argued by many on this floor that because negotiations between nations are intricate, this body ought to leave those matters to the Executive. That because this body is cumbersome, these matters ought to be left solely to the Executive, and his judgment accepted. It is true that the machinery of a democracy is cumbersome, but this is inevitable. There is no escape from this save in a dictatorship.

Either in an open actual dictatorship or by a dictatorship by a Chief Executive making the facts upon which action must be predicated and then having them confirmed by a Congress of yes men. [Applause.]

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, without realizing that the President would utilize the recommendations of the moratorium for the postponement of money due to the United States from foreign governments for one year, and in answer to his telegram of June 23, 1931, which read as follows:

Hon. ADOLPH J. SABATH,
Chicago, Ill.:

You no doubt have seen my statement in Sunday's press of the proposal of the American Government in respect to postponement for one year of all intergovernmental debts. Inasmuch as the proposal is, of course, contingent upon actions by Congress, and as the matter is one of national interest, having no partisan character, in that light I consulted before action the Senators and Representatives of both parties present in Washington and as many as possible who were accessible in the country. This list of generous support from Members was shown in the public statement referred to above. I regret that difficulties of communication rendered it impossible to contact with all Members of the Senate and House. I do not wish to press any Member for reply as to his views, if he prefers not to give them at this time; yet if you are favorable to the proposal in the first paragraph of the statement above mentioned, it would undoubtedly aid in the negotiation now in progress if you could inform me thereof.

HERBERT HOOVER.

I replied as follows:

His Excellency HERBERT HOOVER,
President of the United States,
Washington, D. C.:

I am satisfied that your proposal will be helpful and beneficial, and I will gladly support it; but I still feel that immediate steps should be taken to relieve conditions in our own country, as they are much more alarming than you may be aware of or the press dares to publish.

ADOLPH J. SABATH.

A few days thereafter I sent him the following letter:

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The German people and the banking sponsors of foreign securities should be, and undoubtedly are, tremendously pleased with the moratorium. I myself hope that it will have a stabilizing effect on conditions in Germany; but I am at this time more concerned with reestablishing confidence and restoring normalcy in our own country.

Though I do not like to do this, I feel duty bound to call your attention again to the serious conditions existing throughout the United States. I am particularly apprehensive that the truth as regards the seriousness is being withheld from you.

The charges that are made that the continuous withdrawal of funds from the banks and the alarming dissatisfaction and restlessness are due to communistic activities may or may not be true; but I know that they will not satisfy the 8,000,000 unemployed people. Nor do I believe that the moratorium granted to Germany will stimulate business in our country, as is too generally asserted.

I feel that something more than the above measure is absolutely necessary, and that those in a position of responsibility should not close their eyes to the existent facts.

After my recent telegram to you, Mr. Eugene Stevens, chairman of the Federal Reserve Board in Chicago, invited me to discuss with him just what agencies might be invoked and what measures might be used to bring order out of the existing chaos. At this conference Mr. Stevens stated that the Federal Reserve Board was impotent in relieving matters any further, having gone as far as was permitted under the law.

Now, not only Mr. Stevens, but many bankers with whom I have discussed the matter, recognize that some immediate relief is absolutely necessary to relieve the serious condition of the banks; that is, those which have not been forced to close their doors; to relieve the millions of home owners who have been unable to secure aid and whose homes have been foreclosed; and to relieve the thousands of business men and manufacturers who will be forced to close their doors and augment the tremendous unemployment. Therefore, I again earnestly urge that a special session be called for the purpose of enacting legislation to save the country from complete ruin.

I have advocated for two years that the Federal Reserve Board come to the rescue of the banks and the municipalities by rediscounting some of the securities held by them, which are not acceptable under the law for rediscount; and this could be accomplished without any loss or expense to the Government, inasmuch as these securities are of greater value in most cases than the securities now accepted by the Federal reserve banks for rediscount purposes.

I also urge the creation of a $5,000,000,000 national relief finance corporation patterned after the War Finance Corporation, which was of such tremendous value and benefit to the Nation in the World War, and which can be made to function as efficiently now, during these critical times.

I have become reinforced in my view by the thousands of communications that I have received and am still receiving that before there can be a regeneration of business, that before confidence can be restored, all gambling, and especially short selling, must be stopped. And I feel that if you would take counsel from people interested in the welfare of the Nation rather than from people interested in the stock exchanges you will reach the same conclusion.

There is considerable unanimity of opinion in this country that if the manufacture and sale of beer were resumed it would immediately provide employment for 500,000 people directly and another 500,000 indirectly and would create a demand for grain, which is now selling at the lowest figure in 50 years.

Not only would this create employment and a demand for grain, but it would also have a wholesome effect upon the discord now prevailing, would, in great measure, eliminate the deficit in the Federal Treasury, and would aid materially the cities in obtaining much-needed additional revenue to pay their employees and thus save them from bankruptcy.

Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, to-day I am obliged to state that I greatly regret—after hearing the evidence, charges, and accusations against the President, and those who so adroitly and connivingly recommended the sending of these telegrams—that I did not delay my answer, for having once assured him that I will support it, I am in honor bound to comply with my assurance and will vote for the extension. As I have stated in my telegram, I am hopeful that it will not only relieve conditions in Europe but will have beneficial effects on our own country, and it may lead to action that will bring about the extension of credits, or at least a moratorium on mortgages that are now being and those that shortly may be foreclosed. [Applause.]

I, myself, do not know any reason why this can not be accomplished, though it may, to some extent, inconvenience the holders of such mortgages. Still, I feel that the beneficial effects will outweigh all possible inconveniences, and every effort should be made to bring this about.

As to whether the charges made against the President—that he has played politics with this important question and that he has been used by the international bankers to relieve them in their foreign investments—should receive consideration, I can only say that this is a question that must be given thoughtful consideration.

Mr. Chairman, several years ago I called attention to the unnecessarily excessive loans which were being made by these bankers to the foreign nations and which were being unloaded on the American people, because of the tremendous profit made on such transactions. Not only did I feel that these transactions should be investigated, but I also recommended that action be taken in the future to prohibit such loans unless approved by our Government.

I have also pointed out that these tremendous loans to foreign countries and foreign industries were bound to have detrimental effects on our own financial as well as commercial conditions, and time has clearly demonstrated that I was correct.

Mr. Speaker, I have carefully observed the continuous and persistent determination to aid the foreign nations and interests. If the President and his advisers, yes, and administration, had displayed such determination and had taken such action in relieving the American people and American institutions—instead of trying to placate them with "round-the-corner" prosperity promises—as they displayed in protecting the interests of foreign nations and foreign industries, there is no doubt in my mind that we would now be on the road to reconstruction.

For over two years the President has given us investigations and commissions. Mr. Speaker, what the people demand is relief. I am thoroughly satisfied that if the President had acted on my persistent recommendations two years ago, yes, even one year ago, calling for an extension in the rediscount power of the Federal Reserve Board, the creation of a national relief finance corporation, and the curtailment of short-selling activities, millions of people would not have lost their life-savings in their investments and bank deposits and many banks would not have been compelled to close their doors.

Only to-day 9 banks in Massachusetts, 2 in Illinois, and 4 in other sections of the country have closed their doors.

All this, it can readily be seen, is not helping to reestablish business or confidence.

Had the President the interest of the country at heart he would have listened to the thousands of appeals asking for a special session of Congress, so as to make possible legislation to relieve the existing serious situation.

It is to be deplored that he delayed so long in making recommendations for the constructive legislation which I have advocated. Had he done so when I originally urged him, I am certain that by this time the number of unemployed would not be eight or ten million, as is now the case, but would be tremendously reduced.

For the purpose of informing and allaying the fears of some who believe that this is a 10-year extension, I hereby embody the resolution in the RECORD, showing that the gentlemen who charge that it is a 10-year extension are in error:

Resolved, etc., That in the case of each of the following countries, Austria, Belgium, Czechoslovakia, Estonia, Finland, France, Germany, Great Britain, Greece, Hungary, Italy, Latvia, Lithuania, Poland, Rumania, and Yugoslavia, the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is authorized to make, on behalf of the United States, an agreement with the government of such country to postpone the payment of any amount payable during the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1931, by such country to the United States in respect of its bonded indebtedness to the United States, except that in the case of Germany the agreement shall relate only to amounts payable by Germany to the United States during such fiscal year in respect of the costs of the army of occupation.

SEC. 2. Each such agreement on behalf of the United States shall provide for the payment of the postponed amounts, with interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum beginning July 1, 1933, in 10 equal annuities, the first to be paid during the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1933, and 1 during each of the 9 fiscal years following, each annuity to be payable in one or more instalments.

SEC. 3. No such agreement shall be made with the government of any country unless it appears to the satisfaction of the President that such government has made, or has given satisfactory assurances of willingness and readiness to make, with the government of each of the other countries indebted to such country in respect of war, relief, or reparation debts, an agreement in respect of such debt substantially similar to the agreement authorized by this joint resolution to be made with the government of such creditor country on behalf of the United States.

SEC. 4. Each agreement authorized by this joint resolution shall be made so that payments of annuities under such agreement shall, unless otherwise provided in the agreement (1) be in accordance with the provisions contained in the agreement made with the government of such country under which the payment to be postponed is payable, and (2) be subject to the same terms and conditions as payments under such original agreement.

SEC. 5. It is hereby expressly declared to be against the policy of Congress that any of the indebtedness of foreign countries to the United States should be in any manner canceled or reduced; and nothing in this joint resolution shall be construed as indicating a contrary policy, or as implying that favorable consideration will be given at any time to a change in the policy hereby declared.

I am indeed pleased and gratified that the Democratic majority in Congress, by its actions, has demonstrated that it is ready and willing to cooperate with the President in every way possible and to give lie to some of the Republican politicians and to the Republican press who contend that the Democratic majority in the House will retard any legislation which may tend to improve conditions. We shall not harass and embarrass him as the Republicans had harassed and embarrassed President Woodrow Wilson.

Mr. Chairman, I know the sentiment of the majority of Democrats, and I know that they are desirous of doing all in their power, and will strive diligently to pass any and all constructive legislation—and that without any delay. [Applause.]

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HARE].

Mr. HARE. Mr. Chairman, on June 22 of this year I received a telegram from President Hoover advising of the proposal of the American Government to postpone for one year the payments of all international debts. It was stated in the telegram that he had consulted with some Senators and Representatives in Washington before submitting the proposal. The purpose of the telegram, as all Members of Congress know, was to secure an expression from those who favored the proposal referred to. Of course, there was no coercion on his part, but it was apparent that he was anxious to have a commitment in writing from a sufficient number to justify a policy he had inaugurated and expected to have approved at a subsequent date. In the last paragraph he stated:

If you are favorable to the proposal in the first paragraph of this statement above mentioned, it would undoubtedly aid in the negotiation now in progress if you could inform me thereof.

I gave the matter mature, thoughtful, and studied consideration for two or three days before deciding definitely the position I should take. My first impulse was to comply with the President's request and thereby contribute to what appeared to be an effort on his part to relieve the very acute and serious business depression not only in our own country but over the entire world; but the more I attempted to analyze the effect of such hasty action on our part the greater was my conviction it would not be the part of wisdom to subscribe to the President's policy of procedure, for I was convinced that such a policy was inconsistent with well-established and fundamental policies of our Government. That is, I felt that if such a proposal were to be made, it should first be made through Congress as an organized and assembled body and not by a straw-vote method. I felt then and am convinced now that the proposal was not within the province of the powers defined and granted to the President by the Constitution.

I reasoned further and remembered that following the World War, Congress created a commission consisting of Members of Congress to confer with the allied nations and agreed to act upon a definite and certain plan for the payment of debts arising out of the war. I remembered that the commission had reported to Congress a plan of settlement upon the ability of each nation to pay its indebtedness, and it was my understanding that the plan devised or suggested had been definitely agreed upon by the allied nations. And while I never subscribed to or indorsed the plan, I realized the matter had been acted upon by Congress and had become a positive and definite international agreement and felt that before any change should be proposed or made in that definite understanding the matter should first have been referred to Congress—that branch of our Government clothed with responsibility and charged with the duty to make or authorize agreements of this kind.

I concluded, therefore, that to agree to the President's proposal with the limited amount of information furnished in the proposed agreements it would be equivalent to a transfer of a serious responsibility from the House of Representatives to the Chief Executive, which would establish a precedent that in the future might cause a more serious situation in our own country than that which the President was endeavoring to relieve in foreign countries. I therefore refused to give my indorsement to the President's proposal.

Of course, in my deliberations there were other phases of the subject that were necessarily considered. I was fully aware that business conditions in foreign countries were such that in order for such countries to meet their obligations the people were being taxed beyond their apparent ability to pay. Press reports carried information to the effect that some of the nations were liable to become bankrupt unless steps were taken to relieve them of their obligations. However, I was not unmindful of the serious business depression prevailing in our own country. I was aware of the fact that within the past two years hundreds and thousands of America's most reliable and best citizens, engaged in agriculture, had lost the earnings of a lifetime, and deprived of homes obtained as result of their own efforts and by the sweat of their own brow.

In response to a request a few days after receipt of the President's telegram from one of the leading newspapers of the country asking my position in the matter, I said:

President Hoover's desire to relieve people of foreign nations of their obligations to our Government is inconsistent with the position taken by administration leaders toward our own people at last session of Congress, when they registered decided opposition to legislation proposed to relieve distressed farmers for one year from payment of debts due Federal land banks. The President's attitude at that time toward the distressed at home has caused and is still causing thousands of farmers to lose their homes and suffer untold agony. I can see no good or valid reason why our Government should be more generous to people of foreign nations than to its own citizens.

I think that President Hoover by his proposal is willing to publicly admit the disastrous effect of the Smoot-Hawley tariff act, both at home and abroad, and he apparently believes there can be no recovery from the present business depression under existing trade relations and that the proposed moratorium may in some way relieve the strained business relationship between the United States and foreign nations, without having to go to Congress and ask for the repeal of the last tariff act. Or the proposal may be the first pronounced step to satisfy the big interests that have insisted on the cancellation of all war debts due the United States by foreign nations or that such interests during and following the war.

My further comment was:

If you relieve these nations from the payment of the $250,000,000 soon to be due the Treasury of the United States, there will be an increased deficit in the Treasury and there will be an increased tax burden on the American people, many of whom are carrying burdens too grievous to be borne. If there is to be charity by our Government it should begin at home.

The evidence submitted here during the past week verifies my former impressions or opinions in the matter. That is, my analysis of the situation now confirms the position I took six months ago and I am still convinced that the proposal is not a sound governmental policy nor is it for the best interest of the American people because, "to state it in a nut shell," as we sometimes say, it simply provides for a suspension of debts of the people in foreign countries and at the same time requires Congress to increase the taxes of the American people to the extent of the amounts suspended.

Of course, some good reasons, from an international standpoint, have been advanced for the moratorium but not sufficient to convince me that it should be approved by this Congress, for I am unwilling to indorse a proposition that will increase our taxes in order to decrease those in foreign nations.

The underlying facts in the matter are easily summarized. Let us recapitulate for a moment. During the World War the United States Government issued and sold what was known as liberty bonds to the American people. There was hardly a home in the United States that did not buy a liberty bond or a war-saving stamp. Men, women, and children bought with the patriotic idea that it would help win the war. The money obtained from the sale of these bonds and stamps was loaned to the allied nations of the world to assist in bringing to a successful and hasty end the greatest conflict ever witnessed by the civilized nations of all times.

After the war our Government, right or wrong, loaned additional millions to the allied nations, as well as to Germany—our former foe in battle. This money was advanced for two purposes, one to feed and clothe the starving and naked millions in those sections laid waste by the awful ravages of war; the other to assist these countries in rehabilitating their industries so that they might assist themselves and afford a market for American products. At the same time, however, American capitalists who had grown immensely rich from the opportunities afforded by the war were anxious to further enlarge their swollen fortunes by lending the people of Germany and other foreign nations additional millions, yea, billions, because they felt it was another opportunity to add to their enormous profiteered gains. That was 10 years ago or more. Everything moved along fairly well for the first several years, but the time came when the expense of building and maintaining the implements and agencies of warfare and the payment of interest on the enormous sums of money borrowed from the American Government and American capitalists was found to be extremely burdensome. It is said that bankruptcy and collapse stared some of the governmental institutions in the face. This was particularly true of Germany. Her representatives said, in effect, they had reached a point where it was impossible to carry on their domestic developments, pay the American capitalists, and discharge their obligations to the American Government. Then it was the American capitalists became alarmed, came to Mr. Hoover and the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon, and cried with a loud voice saying:

If you do not come to the rescue of these people our millions will be lost, our fortunes destroyed, and our long-hoarded treasures will be gone forever and forever. Help us, Cassius, before we sink.

My impression from the evidence adduced is they suggested to the President and Mr. Mellon that the Government of the United States could afford to lose or forego the payments of these debts easier than the American capitalists. Mr. Hoover seems to have been as clay in the hands of the potter, and in response to the suggestion decided to propose a moratorium and suspend all international debts for a period of one year. Haste was the essence of the plan. He took a straw vote of Members of Congress, without a semblance of constitutional authority, and there were many Members, in this time of distress and with faith in the President of the United States who hastily committed themselves to the proposal. Of course, they were sincere and now, with a high sense of honor and a sincere jealous regard for their integrity, feel they should stand by their original promise.

There is no doubt but what the people in Germany are burdened with taxes, but the same is true of our own country. The thought that nettles me to the core is that for the past two years men, women, and children engaged in agriculture in this country have been driven from their homes and left without a penny, and without hope, because circumstances over which they had no control made it impossible to pay their obligations on mortgages held by Federal land banks and joint-stock land banks, institutions created and supervised by our own Federal Government. Yet, within less than six months prior to the President's moratorium proposal, I had plead with all the power I could command that a moratorium be granted to our own suffering and depressed farmers, and the President would not so much as lift his hand in their behalf. That is, he was not only unwilling to agree to a suspension of the interest on mortgages held by land banks in this country but, to add insult to injury, he is now willing to suspend the time for the payment of debts due us by foreign nations and at the same time demand an increase in taxes from the same farmers in this country and call upon them to help raise the amount equal to the debts suspended. In other words, he says, in effect, to those foreign nations:

You are due the Treasury of the United States approximately $250,000,000, but I am not going to require you to pay it now, because I can call upon the American people and increase their taxes sufficient to offset the amount due us.

No, gentlemen, in the light of the information I have on the subject, I can not support the bill. It may be that if we had the information furnished the Ways and Means Committee we might see the matter from a different angle, but it is not here. They say the hearings are in the hands of the printer and will be here to-morrow, but that does not do us any good, for we are being called upon to consider this bill and vote to-day. I might say here that the hurry in which this matter is being considered creates some suspicion. Some one has said that "ignorance is the mother of suspicion," and as we have not been furnished with the information and facts upon which this proposal is predicated it is natural there should be some suspicion. Of course, we have had some very good speeches purporting to disclose the facts in the matter, but practically all the speeches made in support of this proposal have dealt more or less with generalities. I do not say this in the spirit of criticism, but general statements and hearsay evidence are not sufficient.

Just as it is impossible for the hand to grasp a wave or a shadow, so it is impossible for the mind to grasp a definite, concrete, fundamental policy or plan from mere generalities. I am unable to see the need for such hurry and haste in this matter. The President acted hastily last June when he issued his moratorium proposal before calling upon Congress. Now, as soon as Congress convenes there must be such haste and hurry in the matter—we have only one day to consider the proposal. I think the situation here well illustrates the thought expressed by Chesterfield when he said:

Whoever is in a hurry shows that the thing he is about is too big for him.

My personal opinion is, Congress has already been too generous with the American people's money, and too beneficent toward foreign nations, because it begins to look now as if the United States, in the long run, will have to pay the cost of a war for which we were in no way responsible.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER].

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, in two minutes, of course, I can not attempt to discuss the resolution before the House. I commend the attitude of the leading Democrats of this House upon the position they have taken. I have been a Member of this House some 20 years. I have served under Democratic Speakers and Republican Speakers. I regret exceedingly that there is not a unanimity on the part of the Democratic Members for this resolution. I regret that one of my colleagues from Missouri [Judge DICKINSON], a distinguished and fine gentleman, has not come with the majority of the Ways and Means Committee in support of this resolution. We must admit that the President of the United States is one we must trust in foreign affairs. I served for eight years under the administration of Woodrow Wilson. I supported President Wilson in every request he made upon this House in connection with the great World War. I voted with him upon every such request that he made to this House. I voted, not because he was a Democrat and I a Republican, but I did it because he was our President, and he was responsible to the American people in connection with foreign affairs. I have no regret that I supported him. It is the duty of every Member of this House, if we are patriotic Americans, to stand back of Herbert Hoover, our President, one upon whom no greater responsibilities have come since the days of the great Lincoln. We should give him every ounce of our support if our country is to come out of this catastrophe with honor and credit. Days and nights he has laboriously and with infinite patience succeeded in preventing a great panic. Those of us in this great Republic that stand for country as against partisan advantage will come to honor and praise him for his great work. The next election will show how the American people feel towards our President, and I predict his reelection by a large majority. I am for him 100 per cent.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW].

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, this is not a party question. This is a great humanitarian question with world-wide bearings. In considering it we should aim to lift ourselves above the miasmas of politics and try to discern with a clear vision the world factors involved. However fiercely partisan contentions may rage within the confines of our own country, there is one place where politics should cease, and that is at the water's edge.

My vote on this question will not be influenced by the fact that the great chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, who espouses this resolution, happens to be a Democrat, though I admire him greatly, or the further fact that it has the support of a large majority of the Democratic members of that ranking committee. It will not be influenced by the fact that the President of the United States, as highly as I respect that office, desires this legislation to pass. With a deep-seated conviction that this is an instance where patriotism should arise above politics, and believing that ratification is the patriotic course, I take my stand for this resolution, and I do so for one reason only, and that is because I believe it is right.

Last June the German nation arrived at the last lap on the road to desperation. By Saturday, June 20, withdrawals from the Reichsbank had assumed such colossal proportions that the legal minimum had been reached and Germany was toppling on the verge of collapse. By Monday the government would have been compelled to declare a general moratorium, the logical sequence of which would have been a repudiation of debts, widespread disorder, and chaos.

President Hoover was in close touch with developments in those trying hours. The wires were kept hot with messages from our diplomatic and consular agents in central Europe advising him of the impending debacle. He did what any patriot, Democrat or Republican, on whom rests the responsibility of the presidency would have done at that critical time. He searched his mind and his heart for ways to serve. He contrived the plan for a 1-year moratorium of intergovernmental debts as a means of saving Germany and bolstering up civilization, and although he does not belong to my political party I give him the credit of saying that when he proposed the 1-year moratorium he rendered a real service to humanity.

Why do I say this? Because the masters of Soviet Russia who are trying their utmost to obliterate God and to subjugate the human race under the yoke of state despotism were waiting for the collapse of the German State to rush their hordes across the borders, and by fomenting rebellion wherever possible they hoped to capture Germany and make it a soviet country, dedicating it to the suppression of religion and to the collectivism that crushes life and inspiration and hope out of the individual and makes him worse than a slave.

To say that America was not interested in the drama that was being enacted in those trying days is wild talk. To say that the whole world was not interested is equally false. It was of the greatest interest and importance to America, to the world, to humanity and civilization that the rugged German character should be sustained in its hour of greatest trial and that the German Republic, which with all of its imperfections, stood for orderly processes and individual rights, should not be allowed to collapse and perish from the earth. Through the moratorium Germany was saved and a turning point was reached that revived her failing finances and credit and secured her place unimpaired in the family of nations.

In those crucial times I was in close touch with the State Department and was frankly advised of Germany's extremity and of the steps taken for her relief. When the President wired to me asking me if I would support his moratorium plan I was able from first-hand knowledge that I had acquired to formulate an immediate answer. I replied that I would vote to ratify the 1-year moratorium, though I would never support a cancellation or scaling of the World War debts.

I am here to redeem my promise. I am genuinely fearful that the defeat of this resolution would create a world climax, with serious reactions in our own country. Therefore I believe I am voting for the best interests of America, as well as the entire world, when I vote "aye" and, as God gives me to see the light, I can do nothing else. [Applause.]

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. MOREHEAD].

Mr. MOREHEAD. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, it is useless to undertake a discussion of the merits or demerits of such an important measure as we now have under consideration in the few minutes that I am allotted for that purpose.

I shall not attempt to state my views at this time but intend to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to explain my position by the telegram that I sent to a newspaper of general circulation, the World-Herald, at Omaha, Nebr.

My telegram dated June 23, 1931, in answer to President Hoover's telegram dated June 22, 1931, follows:

THE WORLD-HERALD, Omaha, Nebr.:

I am opposed to the cancellation of the war debt owed us by the European nations. In my judgment the moratorium is the first step with that object in view. We undoubtedly owe the average American citizen something. The reduction of the debt by Congress was a tremendous amount. It was made without my consent or vote. I am not for oppression. If emergency demands, I would extend time for payment, but it is a just debt and it should be paid. In my judgment this is more to boost the price of foreign stocks and bonds of which the speculators have tremendous holdings. The visit of the Secretary of the United States Treasury to Europe was to bring about the moratorium and has had its effect on foreign stocks and bonds, but will be of but little benefit to the average American citizen and will necessitate the extending of income tax to American citizens of small incomes in order to meet the running expenses of the Government.

The business condition of America we find to-day was, beyond a doubt, brought about through the mismanagement of officials in high places. These officials are not satisfied in looking after America's affairs, but have adopted the methods of Alexander the Great in seeking more worlds to conquer.

The moratorium was urged by our national administration to prevent a crisis—if a crisis exists at the present time, what knowledge have we that it will not be worse in a year from now? If a crisis exists, would it not be better to wash our hands of European affairs and turn to aiding the American citizen, getting back to America's ideals, and adopting the policy, as of old, of hands off meddling with European affairs.

There has been—since history runneth not to the contrary—wars, financial trouble, and chaos in some parts of Europe almost every day in the year. We escaped their financial and other serious problems until the new régime assumed the attitude of directing the destinies of other nations.

I am satisfied in my own mind, as it is humanly possible to forecast, that Europe does not expect to pay its debt obligations to America. There is a sentiment in the House of Representatives and among sponsors of the extension of payment now due America by Europe that we should cancel all of the debts for money owed and advanced to European countries during the World War.

I am thoroughly convinced this is the first move to help the sentiment, and it will be strongly urged in a year from now that we cancel all financial obligations due us from Europe and to increase the taxes of the American people in order to take care of our financial problems which should be paid with the money that Europe owes us.

Americans of small means were coerced during the World War to buy Government bonds and in millions of instances had to borrow the money to buy them. In turn this money was loaned to Europe. Millions of Americans who borrowed this money to buy the bonds had to sell them at a great discount. No one who is fair doubts that American soldiers and American credit won the war for the Allies.

As soon as the moratorium is out of the way Congress will proceed to place greater burdens of taxation on the Americans of moderate means who are now unable to pay their present taxes in millions and millions of cases.

Have we forgotten our sworn obligations to protect American taxpayers and the American citizens?

The present crisis which exists in America—and I think I am well informed on this question—has been brought about by the present national administration and its financial cohorts in trying to rehabilitate Europe at the financial expense of America.

In my judgment, the prime move in this extension of obligations due us, is to save speculators of large institutions who have bought great blocks amounting to billions and billions of Europe's promises to pay, with the expectation of an increase in value, and then peddled them to the American citizens.

If the payment now due America is extended to 1933, and at that time two payments in place of one will be due America, the same hue and cry of the debtor nations will be "They are unable to pay us"; and to our shame, we will find the desertion of those who owe allegiance and loyalty to the people of America joining them in an effort to cancel the debt.

I have been rather sensitive of our treatment. The World War was not America's war. American soldiers and American credit won the war. It was not a war which America originated or was directly interested in, except from a sentimental standpoint.

I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that I shall not vote to cancel these obligations and saddle them upon the backs of my people who are already burdened beyond endurance. Nor shall I cast my vote, in a single instance, to increase the taxes of citizen of moderate means—legislation will be up for consideration within a very short time.

Far be it from me to wreak vengeance on the German people, who, as a class, had very little to do with bringing on the war, which was inspired by German officials. I can see no relief furnished by the moratorium to the German people, who have never asked for a moratorium, realizing that France and other creditor countries retain the right to collect from Germany the full amount due them.

From information coming to me, it will be financially impossible for Germany to pay reparations to France and England, as they have been deprived by the treaty of so many of their natural resources. The obligations due America from the Allies are for money borrowed which enabled them to win the war. By all fairness, in peace or war, this money should be repaid to America, as it enabled the Allies to win the World War.

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. YON. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, we have heard for the last 13 years about the conditions that have existed in America on account of the settlements that were included under the Versailles treaty. I say to you that America to-day is suffering from the injustices of the opposition party who sought to kill Woodrow Wilson and destroy the Democratic Party under the provisions of the Versailles treaty. The whole economic condition that exists in the United States to-day has permeated and grown out of the conditions that have led us up to this situation to-day when we are asked to ratify a moratorium. We know to-day what gentlemen signed the round robin that said that the Senate would not ratify the Versailles treaty.

But from the beginning of that day we have had uncertainty as pertains to international affairs. I say to the Members of this House they wanted to kill Wilson because he wanted ratification that would bring in the League of Nations. What has happened since then? We see that recently Mr. Gilbert has been entering the back door, and Japan has embarrassed us. Japan has embarrassed us on account of our attitude toward the settlement of world affairs.

Now, what do we have confronting us? If the provisions of the treaty had been complied with I do not believe the American people would be now confronted with the situation of extending a moratorium, as expressed by the President in proclamation of last June, but after the bill had been reported to the House it carries provisions equal to extending five years of intragovernmental obligation. I was on the high seas last June when the President mentioned the moratorium to Members of Congress by telegram, and I did not receive the one, maybe, intended for me. I expressed at the time that I had no objection, as I hoped it would react to the benefit of the turpentine, lumber, cotton, and other producers of raw material products of my State—Florida. The response to the declaration created only a week or more of fluctuation on Wall Street or international banking exchange groups to restore confidence in a purely and naturally a speculative Wall Street or international bankers' markets.

I have lost hope through any Republican President's offer. He recognizes that this country and the world at large has been misled by the machinations of his party that he chose to follow in 1920.

Now, in closing, I would be glad to say more, but Mr. Claude Bowers, a nationally known Democrat, editor, publicist, and otherwise known, expressed himself in the Times to-day better than I can; and, with the permission of the House, I extend as follows as part of my remarks:

[From the Washington Times, December 18, 1931]

THE IMPUDENT ATTACKS ON CONGRESS

By Claude G. Bowers

The disposition of administration organs to criticize Congress because it refuses to be the rubber stamp of the Executive, whose repudiation by the American people brought this Congress into being, impresses us as supreme impudence.

If Congress did not act on the 1-year moratorium by the 15th, it is little better than insolence to denounce Congress on that account. It was not summoned to act on the moratorium when the President proposed it. The attitude of the debtor nations in the interval has not been such as to create American confidence in the efficiency of that remedy for world depression.

There has been no disposition to reduce the cost of armament among them, and some of them have manifested the keenest glee in the expression of their hate for the American people, with the gold drain and the attack on the dollar. Meanwhile the European press, almost without exception, has been assuring the people of the debtor nations that the moratorium means an understanding with the administration here for the transfer of the billions in debts from the nations that borrowed the money out of the pockets of our people, to the backs of our people, who made the loan.

There is enough in the changed situation to justify Congress in making its position plain on this transfer—not cancellation—of the debts, and to inquire into the character of the secret conversations at the White House on which the European press predicates its assurance that Americans will pay the bill.

RESPONSIBILITY RESTS ON HERBERT HOOVER

The utter impudence in the criticism of Congress is in this well-known fact: Three months ago the President was urged repeatedly to call Congress in extra session, if only a month before the regular session.

It was pointed out at the time that Congress would be expected to act on the moratorium by the 15th, and that, with the time always required in the mere organization of a new Congress, this would be practically impossible. That was the common-sense view and there was no common-sense answer.

But the President is among those who have little use for the mechanism of government by the people, or, in other words, for representative government in a democracy; he manifestly prefers autocracies, beyond the interference of popular sentiment, and he is notoriously unhappy always when he has "Congress on his hands."

Thus he refused to do his manifest duty—to summon Congress in extra session to deal with the 1-year moratorium and with other matters relating to the distress of millions of Americans who are eating the bread of charity.

If there is a delay in the 1-year moratorium, the responsibility rests on Herbert Hoover—and on no one else.

PERHAPS CONGRESS CAN DO BETTER

Our form of government, under our sometimes praised Constitution, is either right or wrong. The critics of Congress can not eat their cake and have it too. There is a large element, confined mostly to people of large interests and the lunatic fringe of the intelligentsia, who have no use for our form of government. They want to put the "people in their place," and from some autocratic eminence impose the will of a man or a clique upon the masses. That is the reason we hear so much jeering and sneering at Congress—Congress which comes directly from the people.

IMPOLITE—WHAT IMPUDENCE!

And yet there is no little impudence in this; for few have observed during the nine months that the President had Congress "off his hands" that he achieved greatly in the interest of the American people. Perhaps Congress can do better; it can do no worse.

Some of the more precocious of the critics of Congress are shocked to tears that we should be "impolite" to the debtor nations. Impolite! We who spent $26,645,000,000 on a war that would have been lost to the debtor nations otherwise. We who then took not a cent in reparations and not an inch of German territory, that the debtor nations might take it all. We who have since scaled the debt down by billions. Impolite? What impudence!

Within the last few days the press of England has been assuring the English people that the moratorium means the transfer of billions in debt from their shoulders and those of the other debtor nations to the backs of the American taxpayers; and they are manfully standing by the President.

SURELY MR. BECK HAS NOT FORGOTTEN

Well, that is something on which the American people will pass; and the American Congress—which will not be reduced to an echoing station of an Executive who has been repudiated by the American people at the polls—will discuss and consider American interests.

We have always admired the brilliance of JAMES M. BECK, the most brilliant Republican in the House; but when he seeks to create the impression that the disposition to investigate a foreign policy which foreign nations understand to mean the transfer of billions of debts of other nations to American taxpayers, is inspired by mere partisanship, we must take issue.

Are we to understand that when Mr. BECK insists that the President's foreign policy must be accepted without a peek that the President's party, including Mr. BECK, stands for the transfer of the debts to us?

The brilliant Philadelphian is the last man in the world to tell the Democrats they must stand by the President's foreign policy, whatever it may be and without even an inquiry—because he is the President. It has been such a little while ago that Mr. BECK's party refused to stand for the foreign policy of a Democratic President—though, he, too, was the American President.

They said it was not partisanship then; insisted it was patriotism; warmly asserted that they opposed the President's foreign policy because they thought it detrimental to American interests, and said it was their patriotic duty under their oaths to oppose it—in the interest of America.

Surely Mr. BECK has not forgotten, for he was one of the most brilliant and conspicuous in refusing to "stand by the President."

No; we can not subscribe to the theory that because Mr. Hoover is President we should blindly accept his foreign policies without even an inquiry into what they signify. There are many who feel that these policies should be carefully scrutinized, since the President spent the major part of his mature life under the Union Jack and out of touch with American interests or sentiment.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, does the general authorization to revise and extend carry with it the right to include telegrams that we get concerning this matter?

The CHAIRMAN. It does not.

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS].

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, after the most mature consideration I can not get my own consent to vote for this moratorium resolution to postpone for one year the payment to our Government of the amounts due by the foreign governments on their indebtednesses.

I do not oppose the resolution for partisan reasons. I do not consider that I have cast any partisan votes in the House other than those cast in the organization of the House. The message of the President was relayed to me while serving on a committee in the West. I did not reply not through discourtesy, but because of insufficient data at hand.

I criticize no Member's judgment. I, of course, impugn the motives of no one. I have never voted for any of these debt funding bills.

Because I find myself unable to support the resolution (H. J. Res. 123) I desire to briefly state the reasons why I am not able to vote for it.

First. This resolution provides that the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President of the United States, is authorized on behalf of the United States to make agreements with the several foreign countries to postpone the payments of any of the amounts due and payable to the Government of the United States during the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1931, except that in the case of Germany the agreement shall relate only to amounts payable in respect of the costs of the army of occupation.

The postponed amounts are to be paid in 10 equal annual installments with interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum, beginning July 1, 1933, and it is therefore misleading and an error to say they are postponed only for one year.

No agreement is to be made with any country that does not give satisfactory assurance of its willingness and readiness to make agreements with other countries postponing the collection of similar indebtednesses to those contained in this resolution.

The hearings disclose that the sum of approximately $252,566,803 will be postponed by this resolution and the amount spread over a period of 10 years.

If press reports are correct, many, if not all, of these countries had already made arrangements to pay the amount of their respective indebtednesses, and it is difficult to understand why the same should not be accepted by our Government.

Second. Congress passed the resolution recognizing that a state of war existed against Germany on April 6, 1917. During the 19 months that followed we raised, fed, and equipped an army of approximately 5,000,000 as fine men as ever followed our flag to victory. We assembled them in camps hastily prepared, hurriedly drilled them, and then leased, bought, and commandeered every available bottom at excessive costs to secure their speedy transportation across the sea to strengthen the receding lines of our Allies. The advance of the enemy lines had to be checked at all hazards.

A second attempt was being made to capture Paris. Long-range guns were dropping shells upon that terror-stricken city. The French people were demoralized and were fleeing Paris.

The American soldiers assisted in checking the enemy, which turned the tide of battle and saved Paris in the second battle of the Marne, July 15–18, 1918.

The successful St. Mihiel drive on September 12, 1918, was skillfully planned and splendidly executed by our gallant American commander, General Pershing. We contributed to the Argonne offensive, which resulted in the signing of the armistice on November 11, 1918.

Third. In 19 months we spent approximately $22,000,000,000, paying in full every penny of the expenses of our Army. We built and paid for docks through which to land troops and supplies. We built and paid for many, if not all, warehouses on foreign soil. We paid rent on all buildings occupied. Our Government and our soldiers literally spent billions of dollars on foreign soil. We only asked the poor privilege of landing and making the extreme sacrifice, if necessary, in defense of a flag made glorious by Washington and proudly sustained by Woodrow Wilson.

We even paid for the ground where the mortal remains of our sainted dead sleep beneath the lilies of France. We materially assisted in saving France, and who knows but that this assistance saved the world from German domination for generations to come.

We were under no obligations, legal or moral, to share in the expenses of the World War before we entered on April 6, 1917. Since then, thanks to the patriotism of our American people, who bought Liberty bonds at par and sold them at an enormous discount, we have paid every dollar of expense we incurred in the World War. We did not claim or receive any financial benefits as a result of the war, not a foot of added territory and not a dollar in money.

Fourth. We did more. We extended credit to our allies. We loaned them $11,552,354,000. These loans were to be repaid at the same rate of interest we were forced to give to secure the money. Of this every assurance was given. The rate then was 4¼ per cent per annum. In adjusting these foreign settlements we lost $10,705,618,006.90.

I am appending a table, prepared in 1929 for me by the Treasury Department throught the courtesy and at the request of Congressman Theodore E. Burton, who was then a member of the Debt Funding Commission. This table therefore official and authoritative. I have inserted it a number of times in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and its accuracy has never been challenged.

This official table prepared by the Treasury Department shows (1) the countries with which settlements have been made, (2) the date of agreement, (3) the amount of debt funded, (4) interest to be received, (5) total amount to be received, (6) the amount that would have been received on a British basis (3–3½ per cent interest), (7) total amount that would have been received on a 4¼ per cent interest basis, (8) total amount canceled on a 4¼ per cent interest basis, and (9) total aggregate amount, being $10,705,618,006.90, canceled, lost, or remitted in all of the settlements:

[1] Settlement made on British basis.

This table is official. The figures prepared by the Treasury Department can not be disputed. We lose, cancel, forgive, or remit on the settlements with the 13 countries, based on 4¼ per cent interest, the amount we pay on our Liberty bonds, the proceeds from which we loan these governments, $10,705,618,006.90.

This is a gift through the remission of interest of nearly a million dollars per day to 12 European countries.

The difference between 4¼ per cent interest our Government pays on our Liberty bonds and the interest received by us in these settlements represents an annual loss to the American taxpayers of $332,261,750.

It has been frequently stated in debate on the floor of the House that the settlements of these debts provide for the repayment of the principal sums. That is true, extended over a period of 62 years. Let me illustrate: In our settlement with Italy we receive no interest for the first five years, only one-eighth of 1 per cent for the next five years, then one-fourth of 1 per cent for the next five years, until, during the last seven years, the maximum rate of interest to be received is only 2 per cent. Call it principal or interest, we lost or remitted $10,705,618,006.90.

Since this table was prepared, settlements have been made with Greece, and perhaps some other of the smaller countries, in which additional losses have been sustained. Do you not think that is enough?

Fifth. This is the first step to other extensions, then to readjustments, then to reductions, and finally to cancellations. Solemn promises were made when the loans were secured that they would be repaid in full, principal and interest. They were readjusted at a very great loss to the taxpayers of our country.

The "capacity to pay" argument was then used effectively. No economist will hazard an opinion as to the "capacity" of any nation to pay extended over a period of 62 years.

On the question of "capacity to pay," Secretary Mellon said:

> I appreciate, as all reasonable men must, that it is not possible for any set of men to determine with mathematical accuracy the future capacity of a great nation to tax itself and to transfer the avails of taxation to another nation. We are forced to look at the present and to estimate the future.

On this point, in connection with the Italian settlement, Secretary Mellon said:

> The capacity of a nation to pay, over a long period of time, is not subject to mathematical determination. It is and must be largely a matter of opinion.

The President, in his message of December 10, 1931, encourages the foreign governments to request further extensions when he urges the re-creation of the World War Foreign Debt Commission. He says:

> It is clear that a number of governments indebted to us will be unable to meet further payments to us in full pending recovery in their economic life. It is useless to blind ourselves to an obvious fact.

Further, he continued:

> Therefore it will be necessary in some cases to make still further temporary adjustments.

Neither do I favor the re-creation of the commission. It would be like establishing a court and defining its jurisdiction. That would be an invitation to attorneys to file suits.

The re-creation of the commission would be an invitation to several of the foreign countries to make application for further postponements and the recommendation of the commission may greatly embarrass Congress.

The responsibility is with Congress and it should be retained and not transferred to a commission.

Many speeches have been made in the House favoring a readjustment or cancellation. Articles in the press have supported cancellation and reduction. All of this is to create sentiment favorable to a cancellation of these foreign debts.

I favor the committee amendment added as section 5, defining the policy of Congress against further reductions or cancellations of our foreign debts and will heartily support it. I hope it will have a deterring effect against either propaganda or other efforts looking to a readjustment or further reduction or cancellation of our foreign debts. We have already remitted too much—$10,705,618,006.90.

Sixth. The extensions and reductions to our allies enabled them to use their revenues to maintain large standing armies and to build competitive navies, menacing the peace of Europe and rendering many of the foreign governments unstable. These expenditures for military and naval purposes have necessitated very largely increased expenditures for such purposes by our own Government.

In 1913 the United States spent upon her naval establishment $134,092,416.93; Great Britain spent $224,443,296; the German Empire spent $112,000,000; France spent $81,692,832; Japan spent $46,510,216; Italy spent $41,893,420—or a combined total of $640,632,180.93.

In 1930 the United States spent upon her Navy the sum of $375,291,828; Great Britain spent $271,867,022; Germany spent $47,700,000; France spent $101,258,766; Japan spent $131,000,000; and Italy spent $62,785,079—or a total of $989,902,695. With the exception of Germany, each represents a large increase.

The amounts expended on account of the armies of the several nations for the year ending June 30, 1930, are as follows:

Italy, army and air	$170,956,153
France, army and air	247,032,362
Germany, army (only)	130,299,215
United Kingdom, army and air	275,894,190
British Commonwealth of Nations	578,348,258
United States	328,792,724
Total	1,731,322,902

Our Army appropriation for the year 1930–31 was $339,906,459.

For France and Italy the above represent military figures only and do not include expenditures made by other bureaus for military purposes. For instance, the Bureau of Public Roads carries funds for erecting military works and stations and the Department of Agriculture pays for the support of all animals in the Army.

The appropriations made by foreign governments for the year ending June 30, 1931, are not available.

The expenditure for the Navy Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1931, was $357,806,219.

The expenditures for the United States Army in 1914 were $114,020,734, and the naval expenditures for the same year were $139,682,000.

I do not have the amounts of the expenditures by the other countries on their navies during 1913, but the United States expended for that year the sum of $134,092,416 for purely military purposes.

The Washington Star, in an editorial entitled "The Cost of Armaments," under date of December 15, 1931, states:

On the threshold of the Geneva Disarmament Conference the Foreign Policy Association performs a useful service in issuing a comprehensive report on the world's military and naval establishments. The report is compiled from the official figures forwarded to the League of Nations by the various governments invited to participate in the forthcoming effort to beat Mother Earth's swords into pruning hooks. It is an undoubtedly expensive arsenal of weapons that she now maintains, representing a total expenditure in 1930 of $4,500,000,000. Seven great powers—Great Britain, France, Italy, Soviet Russia, Japan, Germany, and the United States—spent two-thirds of that amount, or $2,958,000,000.

The Foreign Policy Association indicates that the ominous feature of these figures is the fact that armament expenditures are steadily rising.

The total 1930 costs were 30 per cent higher than the principal seven powers spent in 1926 and 37 per cent more than they were devoting to armaments in the last pre-war year of 1913. "Excluding Germany, whose armaments were drastically reduced under the Versailles treaty," the report states, "the remaining six great powers were spending 65 per cent more upon arms in 1930 than in 1913."

The Washington Post, in an editorial of December 16, 1931, analyzes the expenditures for armaments, both for the Army and the Navy, in detail for 1930, and compares the amount expended for armaments with the amounts due annually to the United States on foreign debts, as follows:

The following table shows expenditures for armaments in 1930, as compiled by the War Department, and installments on the debt to American taxpayers, which are suspended by the moratorium:

Country	For armaments	For debt to United States
Belgium	$23,247,347	$7,950,000
Czechoslovakia	41,056,000	3,000,000
France	547,133,935	50,000,000
Great Britain	608,024,880	159,520,000
Italy	322,337,000	14,706,000
Poland	122,995,000	7,486,000
Rumania	67,061,000	800,000
Yugoslavia	47,491,000	250,000
Total	1,779,346,162	243,712,000

The outlay of these eight principal debtor nations for armaments is more than seven times what they pay to the United States on account of their war debts. It is strange that Europe should make such a clamor over annual obligations amounting to less than $250,000,000 while stubbornly refusing to cut down its armaments bill that is not far short of $2,000,000,000. So long as these tremendous expenditures for the materials of war continue, any aid that the United States might give through a temporary scaling down of debt payments would be negligible.

Remember, my colleagues, we paid every dollar of the expenses of our own armies during the World War and received no benefits, and asked for none.

We remitted $10,705,618,006.90, and because of increased expenditures by our allies upon their armies and navies we were compelled to place enormously increased tax burdens upon our own people.

No; I am not going to vote for this bill.

Seventh. The President reports a deficiency for the year ending June 30, 1931, of $903,000,000 and an indicated deficit for the current year of $2,123,000,000, and an indicated deficit for the following year of $1,417,000,000. He urges that the strictest economy be observed. With this suggestion I am heartily in agreement, and I will earnestly cooperate in every way to reduce expenditures, and I am going to begin now by voting against this moratorium bill, which postpones payments by foreign powers of $252,566,803, and which transfers that amount to the taxpayers of our own country.

If these foreign governments plead their inability to pay they should be urged to reduce their military and naval expenses and pay the amount saved on their indebtedness to us.

You may answer that there is to be another disarmament conference at Geneva on February 13, 1932. Since the moratorium was suggested last June, there has been plenty of time for the calling of such a conference before the assembling of the Congress in December, 1931.

The World War has been over since November 11, 1918, more than 13 years, and there has been plenty of time for the European governments to examine their budgets and to have realized the necessity for a reduction of armaments, both on land and sea.

I am unwilling to vote for a bill to postpone the payment of this indebtedness to us by governments which, through continued and increased expenditures, compel our Government to spend two and one-half times as much on our Army and Navy as we did before the World War.

Eighth. Let us very briefly survey the conditions in our own country.

I have already quoted from the President's message indicating the deficits for the current year and the year following. Our bonded indebtedness must be increased and additional tax burdens levied upon our own people. What is their condition? Reports indicate some six to eight million people out of employment. Innumerable thousands are being cared for through community chests and from charitable funds. Difficulty is being encounteded in many localities in raising sufficient of these funds. The pinch of winter is approaching. We should give more heed to caring for the needs of our own people before postponing payments due by foreign governments, and, to the extent of the amounts postponed, increasing the tax burdens of our own people.

The farmers of the country, who represent our greatest basic industry, agriculture, are receiving the lowest prices for their products within the memory of many now living, and certainly within a generation. Wheat when threshed brought to the farmers around 30 cents per bushel, and in some localities less; oats 12 to 15 cents per bushel; corn 18 to 20 cents per bushel; cotton around 1½ cents per pound in the seed; livestock—cattle, hogs, and sheep—below the cost of production; and all other farm products at ruinously low prices.

True, these prices have fluctuated favorably to some extent, but many farmers have had to dispose of their products upon the lowest markets to meet taxes, rents, and other urgent needs, and the other obligations for which they were mortgaged. They are making heroic struggles, but their purchasing power is all but gone. Business in some communities, largely supported by agriculture, is depressed to the point of bankruptcy. Mortgages are being foreclosed on their homes and farms. Many can not pay their taxes. School warrants are not being paid, and teachers must, in many localities, discount them at ruinously sharp rates. Industrial centers are feeling the loss of trade through the loss of the purchasing power of the farmers. The agricultural counties and States are losing population.

I have not overdrawn the picture. I know the condition of the farmers. I live among them and own farm lands myself. Only in exceptionally favored cases are any of them receiving more than taxes and the cost of their meager upkeep.

We have already remitted too much to foreign governments. In my judgment, to further postpone payments by foreign governments and to re-create the Debt Commission to encourage further postponements, reductions, or cancellations, will not remedy the unhappy condition of our own distressed people.

Ninth. Finally let me invite attention to the fact that the foreign debt settlements have been a harvest for international bankers. In every case when a settlement was made with a foreign country it was accompanied by a press report to the effect that a large loan had been negotiated by the international bankers at satisfactory rates of interest and large discounts. In turn these loans were sold to literally thousands of investors throughout the country. The latest reports are to the effect that some $6,000,000,000, or more, in foreign investments have been sold to the people throughout the United States. Now that payments on these investments may not be realized their market value has greatly depreciated. Everyone must appreciate that this moratorium is largely in the interest of the investors in these securities.

Let me again remind you that every dollar remitted or postponed is at the expense of the taxpayers of our own country.

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHANNON.]

Mr. SHANNON. Mr. Chairman, it is said of Stanhope, the greatest of English diplomats, that he never concerned himself with trifles. In the World War, when England and France had their backs to the wall, Lloyd-George cried out:

> As the Lord is my witness, England does not covet a foot of ground.

He meant it. An English diplomat always means everything he says concerning trifles. The loot, however, proved to be empires in territory—not mere feet—for those on the side of the victors who wanted to take.

England and France took freely of the territory of Germany. Then occurred a division of another kind. It was the taking of the livestock, hogs, and poultry, etc., from Germany, and dividing it among the people of Belgium and France. This was in reprisal for the despoliation visited upon France and Belgium by Germany. This, of course, is defended on the ground that it merely made amends for the destruction that took place in these countries at the hand of Germany.

The United States had contributed vastly in man power and money to all combatant countries on the side of the victor. In reparation it asked for nothing; in good faith, coveted nothing; and retired without profiting in any of the spoils taken from defeated Austria and Germany.

However, the United States had a bill, a vast one, running into billions, for moneys and supplies furnished England, France, and other allied countries. In settlement of this claim, a most liberal bargain was struck in favor of both England and France as to the amount to be paid by them to the United States. From the day that this was agreed upon these debtor nations have carried on in a way that could be construed as being nothing other than an attempt to renege on the debts owed us.

All of the United States has been in an unsettled business condition for the past two years. The administration seemed to take no serious notice of it, notwithstanding the fact that banks were failing by the hundreds weekly throughout the great Middle and Western States. Not until a disturbance showed its head in the banking circles in Pittsburgh and started on its march on the citadel of wealth in New York did the administration get busy. It began to leak out that the great banks of New York were loaded with paper of foreign governments and debtors in foreign lands that was worthless or almost so.

Then started the movement of governmental service, not to save humanity, or America, but to save the international bankers. It reached a climax, to my way of thinking, when in the early days of October, two meetings were held in the city of Washington. The New York Times, a reasonably carefully edited newspaper, announced that one of these meetings was held in the private apartments of Mr. Andrew Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury, at which there was present a representative of every Wall Street bank. Instantly following this meeting, there was an Executive call for an assembly of the leaders, so-called, of Congress, to come posthaste to Washington; and three nights later the second meeting was held at the White House.

It is said that Government officials offered in some cases to send high-powered airplanes for these congressional leaders, that they might get here more quickly. This was the fourth month after the famous moratorium poll by telegraph.

So one sees the spectacle of the Senators and Congressmen of the people answering a call from the Executive, and almost meeting, as they came in, the gentlemen from the Wall Street banks going out.

The big New York bankers delivered their message in secret. The Executive promptly responded to it, and assembled, not Congress, but its leaders, so-called. I have it from more than one of those who participated in the October White House meeting that the real purpose of the assembly was to grant a further moratorium, longer in time than the one granted by telegraph four months before.

To all America this thing should be odious. Why should there be any meetings in secret with the agents of the big financial concerns, and why should there be a meeting between the Executive and specially selected representatives of Congress on a matter of business that belonged to the entire people of the United States? Why not a meeting in open? Why should decisions concerning all America be arrived at secretly?

It now appears at this end of the international bankers, the Wall Street group, that they admit having made bad loans in Europe and indicate that if the United States waives payments from England and France those countries, in turn, will cease collecting loot from Germany, and thereby the bankers will get something from their loans to industries in the impoverished countries; and then it is indicated that some of this will reach a small number of investors in America. On the contrary, if a regular, orderly course is pursued and the United States collects under its loans, all of America will share in all that is collected, as against the other plan through which only a small group of Americans will benefit.

In 1894 Grover Cleveland issued in times of peace $262,000,000 in bonds. For more than 35 years our Republican friends have said harsh things not only of Grover Cleveland but of the Democratic Party as well for his having done this. Growing out of the bond issue there was a Senate investigation, and Missouri's great Senator, George Graham Vest, undertook to make J. Pierpont Morgan disclose the profits that he made as a consequence of these bonds. Mr. Vest asked: "You decline to reveal the profits made by your firm?" Mr. Morgan answered: "I do, sir."

So you see the representatives of the international bankers of to-day, who decline to talk, have a precedent in the man who built this great financial tower that has finally brought all America to this terribly depressed state.

As an evidence that the great bankers have no patriotism in their souls, let me quote what Noyes said of the Morgan-Belmont syndicate of 1894:

> They measured with little mercy the emergency of the Government.

Who ever believed that the house of Rothschild, or the house of Morgan, or any other of the great financial houses, had either a heart or a soul? Verily, I believe that many countries were precipitated into the World War by propaganda and money used by these great houses for the specific purpose of saving their loans to Russia, France, and England, which would have been lost forever to those bankers if other countries had not been forced into the war. What great banking house ever cared how many human lives were sacrificed, so long as their loans and interest could be saved? [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself time. I expect to vote for House Joint Resolution No. 123, known as the moratorium on foreign debts, to authorize the postponement of the amounts payable to the United States from foreign governments during the fiscal year of 1932 and their repayment over a 10-year period beginning July 1, 1933. [Applause.]

On June 20, 1931, President Hoover put out a statement through the press which read in part as follows:

> The American Government proposes the postponement during one year of all payments on intergovernmental debts, reparations, and relief debts, both principal and interest, of course, not including obligations of governments held by private parties. Subject to confirmation by Congress, the American Government will postpone all payments upon the debts of foreign governments to the American Government payable during the fiscal year beginning July 1 next, conditional on a like postponement for one year of all payments on intergovernmental debts owing the important creditor powers.
> The purpose of this action is to give the forthcoming year to the economic recovery of the world and to help free the recuperative forces already in motion in the United States from retarding influences from abroad.
> The world-wide depression has affected the countries of Europe more severely than our own. Some of these countries are feeling to a serious extent the drain of this depression on national economy. The fabric of intergovernmental debts, supportable in normal times, weighs heavily in the midst of this depression.
> From a variety of causes arising out of the depression, such as the fall in the price of foreign commodities and the lack of confidence in economic and political stability abroad, there is an abnormal movement of gold into the United States which is lowering the credit stability of many foreign countries. These and the other difficulties abroad diminish buying power for our exports and in a measure are the cause of our continued unemployment and continued lower prices to our farmers.
> Wise and timely action should contribute to relieve the pressure of these adverse forces in foreign countries and should assist in the reestablishment of confidence, thus forwarding political peace and economic stability in the world.
> Authority of the President to deal with this problem is limited, as this action must be supported by the Congress. It has been assured the cordial support of leading members of both parties in the Senate and the House. The essence of this proposition is to give time to permit debtor governments to recover their national prosperity. I am suggesting to the American people that they be wise creditors in their own interest and be good neighbors.

After having read the statement put out by the President, a statement that I had every reason to believe was a statement of the facts, in which he said that something must be done at once or the Government of Germany would collapse, promptly on receipt of his telegram I wired him as follows:

> President HERBERT HOOVER,
> Care of White House, Washington, D. C.
> In reply to your telegram of the 22d, will say that I heartily approve of the 1-year moratorium proposed by you, providing all other nations will grant the same extension of time. When a moratorium is agreed to, there should be an understanding that there will be a suspension in the building of armament, or the extension of time will not accomplish the desired results.

Mr. Chairman, after having said I heartily approved of the 1-year moratorium proposed by the President I expect to cast my vote in favor of it, and had I not been convinced that it was the course to pursue at that time, I am frank to say that after listening to the Secretary of State, Mr. Stimson, the Under Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mills, whom we have every reason to believe have stated the facts before our committee, I would have been convinced that granting of an extension at that time prevented not only the collapse of the German Government but other governments as well.

I realize that many statements have been made here on this floor as to this being nothing more or less than a scheme of our international bankers; but those that have made these statements, in my opinion, have not been able to prove their case. The facts are, this move was made not only to save Germany, but to save ourselves, for had the German Government collapsed in June or July, others would have gone with it; all of Europe would have been affected and no one can tell what the ultimate result might have been on this country.

The Secretary of State and Under Secretary of the Treasury have informed us that Germany could no longer meet her payments and that if action had not been taken at that time it was, the possibilities are, that Germany would have gone into bankruptcy. And what would that have meant? Her debts to all countries would have been repudiated. Some of the other countries of Europe would have followed her, and those that were not forced into bankruptcy would have asked that the debts they owed us be canceled, the effects of which would have been disastrous.

In granting this extension there is one thing we must bear in mind—international debts are only moral obligations to pay, and can only be collected in one way, if a nation refuses to pay, and that is by using our Army and Navy, and this method I would not approve of; so our choice is not between payment and nonpayment, but between a settlement that can be met and the one that throws them into bankruptcy, destroys the Government, and creates chaos in not only one country but possibly in many.

It has been stated that this was the first move toward the cancellation of all war debts. By the committee amendment, which in fact is the Ragon amendment, we have stated emphatically that it is against the policy of this Congress to either cancel or reduce the debts, so there can be no question arise as to our position on this question.

It has also been stated that our farmers, who have made loans, many of our business men who are not able to meet their obligations, and the thousands upon thousands that are trying to pay for a home to live in should be granted a moratorium, and with this I agree; and will say here and now that I expect to do everything I possibly can to have legislation of this kind favorably considered during this session; but to refuse to pass this resolution will not help those who need extension in our country, in fact it may do the opposite; should the resolution not pass it might mean the collapse of not only the German Government but others as well and affect the already deplorable conditions we have in this country.

I realize it would have been better for the President to have called a special session of Congress, but he did not do it, so now we are facing a problem that must be met; and the question that confronts us is, Are we going to refuse to confirm what, in the opinion of the majority of this body and the one at the other end of the Capitol, thought last June was the thing to do, and do what we can to relieve a depressed condition that existed in June and still is serious, not only in Germany but in many other countries in Europe, and here in our country; or, are we going to repudiate by our votes the guaranty that has been made by our President?

Mr. Chairman, as I stated in the beginning, I expect to support the resolution. [Applause.]

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. PARKS. I desire to make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas makes the point of order that there is not a quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and seventy-three Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HOWARD]. [Applause.]

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I rise now only for the purpose of calling attention to an unwitting error committed this afternoon by my colleague from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA]. I am not one of those who is always accusing newspapers of misrepresenting. I was never misrepresented by a newspaper in my life, but sometimes the boys in their reports of my statements forget to use all of them. There was a case of that kind in the statement made to-day by the gentleman from New York, where he put me in the attitude of favoring the cancellation of all war debts. He was absolutely right in as far as he went, but my further statement was that I was in favor of canceling every war debt owed by any nation to another nation, provided all nations would agree to cancel all war debts due from any other nation.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I shall be glad to add that to the gentleman's statement, which I quoted from the Associated Press.

Mr. HOWARD. I know the gentleman will, because he is always courteous and he is almost always accurate.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I thank the gentleman.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, in my speech upon this floor on December 9 I expressed the opinion that the President's action in granting the moratorium will inevitably lead eventually to the cancellation of our European debts. I now wish to state the basis for that opinion.

THE TREATY OF VERSAILLES WAS DICTATED

The treaty of Versailles was a dictated treaty. Germany signed it under compulsion. She yielded merely to force. Germany agreed to the armistice upon the basis of Wilson's 14 points, and placed herself in position where she could no longer resist the armies of the Allies. When Germany came to Versailles ready to make peace on those terms she was confronted by demands for territory, reparations, and other terms not contemplated in the armistice.

The Allies refused to make peace upon the terms of the armistice. Having Germany in a position where further resistance was impossible, they made vast extensions of their demands. Wilson's 14 points were ignored, and heavy additional conditions imposed upon a helpless Germany.

Germany regarded this as a gross breach of faith. She would never have signed the treaty except for the fact that her fleet had been interned at Scapa Flow, her armies had retired from their positions, and vast supplies of war material had been abandoned—she could not renew the war.

For this reason Germany does not recognize the treaty as having any moral binding force. Particularly does Germany resent the imposition of reparations postulated as it was upon the basis that she had deliberately provoked the war. All Germany was then, and is now, united upon one thing—that is, in refusing to accept the postulation of her war guilt.

Germany will never admit war guilt. She will never pay one penny of reparations without compulsion. She recognizes no moral obligation whatever to pay. She will pay only so long as she is unable to resist payment by force. The moment that Germany feels herself strong enough to resist payment, that moment will she refuse to pay anything further.

GERMANY WILL NEVER ACCEPT WAR GUILT

That Germany will never accept war guilt and will never pay reparations postulated upon war guilt is universally recognized. France and England have known it, and our Government has also been aware of it. Upon this field has raged the battle of the diplomats over the settlement of the debts owed to us by the European nations. Our debtors have sought to unload upon us the burden of collecting from Germany. We in our turn have taken the position that reparations are a matter between England, France, and other allied countries on the one hand, and Germany on the other, and with which America had nothing to do. We have insisted that the allied countries pay us what they owe us whether they collect anything from Germany or not.

Upon the issue as to who should act as collector from Germany, the battle has gone on between our diplomats and those of the Allies. France was the last to give in. She did so haltingly and grudgingly, maintaining to the last that her payments to us should be conditioned upon collection from Germany. It seems certain that concessions were made to our debtors, particularly to France, upon amount and terms of settlement, to induce her to give up the insistence that we should be the collector from Germany.

The American position was steadfastly adhered to during the Wilson administration. Under Secretaries Hughes and Kellogg it was firmly defended. It has remained for President Hoover to make a complete surrender of that position and at last to condition payments to us upon the ability of our debtors to collect from Germany. The President and Secretary Stimson have laid down their arms upon the field which was so courageously defended during the Wilson administration and under Harding and Coolidge.

It will be seen that President Hoover's action has a much wider significance than the mere granting of a year's delay on the debts. It is the way in which it was done that is disastrous. It is the fact that at the instance of Germany the President took the initiative and volunteered to secure from England and France the postponement of reparations payments.

Had the President adopted the strategy of having the proposal come from France or England, and the postponement made at their instance and for their benefit, the diplomatic situation would be different. We would not then have been connected with the reparations problem.

REQUEST FOR MORATORIUM SHOULD HAVE COME FROM ENGLAND OR FRANCE

Probably France, and certainly England, had as much interest in an extension to Germany as we ourselves. England also had her vast private loans to Germany. The consequences of Germany's political collapse would have been more harmful to France and England than to us. Sooner or later the request that we make the extensions would have come from them. It is certain that, at a hint from President Hoover, England and France would have been glad to make the request for the extension. England gladly would have taken the initiative. She needed the extension almost as badly as Germany.

For this lack of diplomatic foresight the battle was lost. Whether Congress ratifies the President's action is of little moment. Our Government, by his action, has admitted that our debtors are entitled to extensions until they can collect from Germany. If Germany does not pay, they are not to pay. In logic this does not relate merely to payments falling due in 1931 and 1932, but to the entire debt; it is applicable to all the payments. The logic of the President's action is that if France and England can make no future collections from Germany, they are under no duty to pay anything upon what they owe us.

The significance of the President's action and the logic of its consequences are known to the nations. France and England know that they need not pay us if Germany does not pay them. Germany knows it also.

Germany will not pay one penny more unless she is forced to do so. All future collections must be extorted from Germany through superior force. France used this force when she invaded the Ruhr, and might use it again. Germany knows that America will not use armies and navies to force her to pay. She knows that the burden of collecting from her has been unloaded upon us. She knows that public opinion in the United States will not tolerate that we use force to collect from her. Under these circumstances Germany will not pay.

Germany will not pay because she feels under no moral obligation to pay. She will not pay because we will not use force to compel her to pay. France will not pay us because she now has the admittedly valid excuse that Germany will not pay her. England, Italy, and all the rest have this perfect excuse; and we are forbidden by the logic of what we have done from answering our debtors that they should pay whether they can collect from Germany or not. We have agreed that we are interested in German reparations. We can never get away from that.

THE BATTLE OF THE DEBTS IS LOST

The President presents Congress with an accomplished situation. Our cause is already lost. What we are doing here now is a vain and futile thing. Whether we ratify or not, our debts are lost. We will never be able to collect anything more.

The President's action in granting the moratorium without the consent of Congress was illegal. His attempt to cover it up by polling Congress by telegram was undignified and unstatesmanlike. It was unjust and unfair, for he did not tell the Members whom he sought to bind by their answers the facts. Congress does not yet know the facts. When in after years the secret correspondence upon which the President acted is finally unrolled it will be found that we are called upon to vote to-day without any real and comprehensive knowledge of the facts which should control our action. In that unprejudiced day the just commentator will pronounce the action of President Hoover in granting the moratorium as not only illegal and unconstitutitonal, but as comprising the most stupendous diplomatic blunder in our history.

Our troops won the battle of the soldiers in the Argonne—President Hoover lost the battle of the debts in Washington. [Applause.]

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM].

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, a majority of the Members of the House of Representatives and of the Senate of the United States responded to the President last June to the effect that, if he entered into this moratorium proposal with other nations for the postponement of intergovernmental debts, they would support that action when Congress convened.

The argument has been made here that the proposal now before us in the joint resolution differs from the arrangement which the President announced on June 20 that he intended to propose to the nations involved. We have heard much about the London protocol and about the Franco-American agreement, and both in this House and before the Committee on Ways and Means, there have been constant reiterations that we should get the London protocol and the Franco-American agreement for proof of the claim that there is a substantial variance between the proposal which the President announced on June 20 and that which is contained in the pending joint resolution.

When the time came for the settlement of details which necessarily followed the main proposal, France did request, and did secure, a slight change in the modus operandi with reference to the unconditional reparations that were to be paid by Germany under the Young plan, but it would be a great violation of logic and an equal perversion of judgment to say that that arrangement was any substantial variance from the proposal made by the President on June 20.

I have before me the so-called Franco-American agreement, dated July 6, 1931, which was released to the press on that date, and therefore everybody has had the opportunity to learn the contents of that document, and the difference is not as serious, either in its inception or in its contents, as it has been presented to us to be.

The first and second paragraphs of that agreement read as follows:

1. The payment of intergovernmental debts is postponed from July 1, 1931, to June 30, 1932.

Second. However, the Reich (meaning Germany) will pay the amount of the unconditional annuity. The French Government agrees, in so far as it is concerned, that the payments thus made by the Reich shall be placed by the Bank for International Settlements in guaranteed bonds of the German railways.

The protocol of the London conference, under date of July 23, 1931, made no reference to the arrangement between France and Germany, but the London committee of experts, in its report of August 11, 1931, provided the terms and plan of operation of that agreement in the following language, as contained in its Annex I, namely:

(a) On the 15th of each month, from the 15th of July, 1931, the German Government shall pay to the Bank for International Settlements an amount in foreign currencies of 51,000,000 reichsmarks as defined in the new plan.

(b) The Bank for International Settlements shall make the normal provision by means of these amounts for the part of the service of the German Government international 5½ per cent, loan, 1930, which is chargeable on the unconditional part of the annuity.

(c) The balance of about 45,000,000 reichsmarks shall be paid over the same day by way of loan in foreign currencies to the German Railway Co. by the Bank for International Settlements.

(d) During the period from August 1, 1931, to July 1, 1932, both inclusive, the creditor governments, acting in agreement with the German Government, hereby give the necessary instructions to the Bank for International Settlements to release the German Railway Co. from the reparation tax of 55,000,000 reichsmarks which that company has to pay monthly under the terms of the debt certificates of the German Government and the German Railway Co., subject to the three conditions, that—

(i) On the 15th of the preceding month the German Government shall have paid to the Bank for International Settlements in foreign currencies the sum of 51,000,000 reichsmarks mentioned under (a) above.

(ii) The sum of about 45,000,000 reichsmarks mentioned under (c) above shall have been paid in foreign currencies to the German Railway Co. by way of loan against the delivery of that company's bonds, all in accordance with paragraph 2 below of the present Annex.

(iii) The service of the German external loan, 1924, in respect of interest and sinking fund shall have been assured.

In other words, in order to avoid a technical default or technical variance in the terms of the Young plan with reference to unconditional payments to be made by Germany, it is provided that Germany would go through the form of paying the money into the Bank for International Settlements and that the bank on the same day would invest the money in the bonds of the German railway. The German railway is associated in such a way with the German Government that the money would actually be available to the German Government itself.

Notwithstanding these facts, I call attention to the statement in the views of the minority—which I hope was made unintentionally—the minority of members of the Ways and Means Committee who dissented from the majority of the committee with reference to the passage of the bill.

I refer to page 11, where I read, as follows:

It is patent that the postponement sought in this legislation is not for one year. It is true that the legislation treats of the payment of the debts for a 1-year period, but this deferred payment is strung out over a period of 10 years. It was admitted by the spokesman for the administration, Mr. Mills, that the President did not have in mind June 20, 1931, the payment over a 10-year period of the indebtedness due for this fiscal year.

Further, as evidenced by the above quotation, the postponement was to be "of all intergovernmental debts." In the agreement finally reached France refused to accede to that proposal. All unconditional reparations due France from Germany are to be paid. There can be no doubt but that such condition is a deviation from the President's proposal. France is given a decided advantage in this respect.

Of course, when the moratorium was to be granted for one year, some arrangement had to be made for the payments due during that year. The whole scheme of payments might have been extended for one year and then the last payments would in every case have occurred a year later than contemplated by existing agreements. That would have constituted a real moratorium for one year. A doubling of all payments during the following year would obviously have imposed greater burdens than the nations could bear on the basis of their "capacity to pay," which we ourselves laid down as the rule in the debt-funding agreements. The extension of the payments postponed during the moratorium year over a period of 10 years is an exceedingly fair arrangement, particularly since the deferred payments are to carry interest at 4 per cent per annum.

In the second paragraph, which I have quoted from the "views of the minority," they say merely that payment was to be made, but they do not say that immediately on the same day the money is made available for the German Government by the operation of the Bank for International Settlements.

We have had similar innuendoes and insinuations before the Committee of the Whole and before the Committee on Ways and Means during this debate. We have heard the same character of argument in opposition to this bill—deductions drawn and conclusions made with reference to important international problems. We have seen this procedure repeatedly; gentlemen will read a newspaper account and then refer to some mysterious document, like the protocol of London or the Franco-American agreement, and then draw unwarranted conclusions. You have heard them say repeatedly: "It is fair to assume"; "It is reasonable to infer"; "It seems obvious"; "It is a proper conclusion"; and so forth.

For instance, it happened that the German Government did not avail itself of the moratorium provided under the Young plan before Premier Laval of France came to Washington. The Premier had conferences with President Hoover and an interchange of courtesies and of views, of course. He went back to Europe. He arrived in Paris, and soon thereafter Germany took steps to avail herself of the moratorium privilege under the Young plan, because conditions in Germany had been growing constantly worse. One of our good brethren comes here and tells us that the Germans did not use the moratorium before Premier Laval came to America. He came here and then went back, and thereafter Germany invoked the moratorium under the Young plan.

It is at once concluded that Germany made use of the moratorium under the Young plan because Premier Laval had been to the United States and had some conferences with President Hoover, and that Mr. Hoover and he had entered into a secret arrangement that Germany should immediately avail herself of the moratorium privilege under the Young plan. That is the kind of argument we have heard from the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN], who by innuendo and inference has sought to create a world situation which exists, fortunately, largely in his own imagination. Things are bad enough in the world to-day. We had some information before our committee which gave us very great food for thought, and every Member of this House feels the responsibility of the present moment; but we will not improve conditions by injecting into the situation things that do not exist, and by drawing inferences and conclusions from rumors and hearsay and newspaper articles and what not try to create a condition which has no foundation in fact. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, let us brush away subterfuges and camouflages and bravely and fairly face the actual situation. The moratorium was necessary and imperative last June. It saved the world from impending disaster by rescuing Germany from immediate collapse. We can not simply refuse to be "our brother's keeper." Our brother needs help, and we should extend to him the assistance within our power. In doing so we are also serving our own best interests. The collapse or even temporary setback of the civilization, of which we are ourselves both the product and a large moving force, would certainly bring irreparable losses to our own people. This moratorium proposal, having given and promising at least temporary aid, merits, aye, it demands our prompt and wholehearted approval.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to include in my remarks a statement of the President and a copy of my telegram.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. CANFIELD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE].

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, last June, on receiving a telegram from the President, I answered immediately, without consulting anyone, that I would support the moratorium. I did so because then I realized from my study and from the information that I had received the condition that really existed in Germany at that time—a condition bordering upon communism and chaos. I did so because I realized that if the conditions in Germany were half as bad as they were said to be they would affect America to a great extent. I did so because the President at that time said that politics were not to be considered in it, and yet, unfortunately, within a very few days the statement was given out by some high-ranking members of the Republican Party that this was a wonderful piece of constructive work on the part of the President and would insure his reelection. Imagine my surprise when I came to Washington at this session at the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK] taking it upon himself to advertise to the country that every Democrat on this side of the aisle was against the President on the moratorium question and that every Republican was for him. Not only that happened, but only this last week the Secretary of War broke loose before the National Republican Executive Committee. He seemed to think, and he expressed the thought, that there was not a Democrat in Congress who had even an idea, that we were waiting here for the President to tell us what to do. And so I am for this moratorium regardless of what has happened, because I believe it is for the best interest of the world situation to-day, the Republic of Germany, and, above all, the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SUMMERS].

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, upon receipt of the President's wire as to my attitude on a 1-year moratorium on allied debts, I wired as follows:

JUNE 23, 1931.

Hon. HERBERT HOOVER,
President of the United States, Washington, D. C.

Wholeheartedly indorse your constructive proposal to postpone for one year all intergovernmental debts contingent on positive assurances of immediate and substantial reduction in expenditure on armaments by all participating nations.

JOHN W. SUMMERS.

Mr. Chairman, this telegram committed me to the moratorium "contingent on positive assurances of immediate and substantial reduction in expenditure on armaments by all participating nations."

I have made careful inquiry, but have not found the slightest evidence that these nations have reduced expenditures on armaments one single dollar.

With Germany on the brink of a financial collapse, with its disastrous effects on all Europe and America, I did not expect delay while international conferences were assembled, but I did believe then, and I do believe now, that a demand for curtailment of expenditures for armaments, coupled with the moratorium, might have been effective in diverting Europe from preparations for war and starting her on a sane course—even on the road to economic recovery.

WHAT ARE THE FACTS?

The six great powers of Europe have increased their expenditures on armaments 65 per cent since 1913.

From an editorial in the Washington Post I quote this interesting statement:

The following table shows expenditures for armaments in 1930, as compiled by the War Department, and installments on the debt to American taxpayers, which are suspended by the moratorium:

Country	For armaments	For debt to United States
Belgium	$23,247,347	$7,950,000
Czechoslovakia	41,056,000	3,000,000
France	547,133,935	50,000,000
Great Britain	608,024,880	159,520,000
Italy	322,337,000	14,706,000
Poland	122,995,000	7,486,000
Rumania	67,061,000	800,000
Jugoslavia	47,491,000	250,000
Total	1,779,346,162	243,712,000

The outlay of these eight principal debtor nations for armaments is more than seven times what they pay to the United States on account of their war debts. It is strange that Europe should make such a clamor over annual obligations amounting to less than $250,000,000, while stubbornly refusing to cut down its armament bill that is not far short of $2,000,000,000. So long as these tremendous expenditures for the materials of war continue, any aid that the United States might give through a temporary scaling down of debt payments would be negligible.

Under these conditions, Mr. Chairman, I can not keep faith with our honored President, myself, and my constituents and vote for the moratorium. My vote must therefore be recorded against it. Others who pledged themselves unconditionally will no doubt also keep faith and vote for the moratorium.

No question but Europe's tax burdens are heavy, but I do not conceive it as my duty toward a spendthrift individual or nation to encourage the pursuit of wasteful habits.

While this moratorium does not directly involve cancellations, I want to record myself now as against cancellation of foreign debts. I am opposed to scaling down. I am opposed to reductions. I am opposed to reestablishment of the War Debt Commission. I believe Europe is as able to pay during the next 60 years as my farmers are to pay their debts at this time.

If international bankers have oversold worthless foreign securities, then that is their affair and shall never become the burden of the American taxpayer by my vote.

Of course, these nations are in distress, but their distress is of their own making. More than that, they have brought distress on America and the world. I want these nations to know that the attitude of Congress and the American people is against cancellation or reduction. When the countries of Europe know that as to war debts they must stand on their own financial feet, they may be slower in precipitating another world cataclysm. [Applause.]

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY].

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, it is my intention to support this resolution, thereby keeping faith with the President of the United States. When I answered the President in my telegram last June, I said that I would support a 1-year moratorium was absolutely against any debt cancellation, and I say now that I will be absolutely against any further extension of the moratorium. Section 5 of this resolution very clearly expresses my sentiments.

A very close and dear friend of mine, a newspaper man, was in Berlin the night before the news was flashed to Germany of the moratorium going into effect. He said that in the city of Berlin that night there was hardly a soul upon the streets, there was a tenseness in the air, and there were police upon every corner waiting for the communistic riots which they felt sure would take place the next day, probably leading to revolution, if the moratorium did not go into effect.

I believed when I answered the telegram of the President that I was doing something to help to prevent chaos in Germany, chaos which would bring disastrous results to the entire world. Therefore I am going to vote for this resolution to keep faith with the President. And may I express the hope also that those of you who are voting for this resolution to-day, those of you who spoke so feelingly in debate of the heroism of the American service men during the World War, everybody in this House who votes to place this moratorium into effect to-day will, when my friend from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] and I immediately after the Christmas recess ask the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives to bring in a bill for the immediate cash payment of the soldiers' bonus, vote for that also. We have helped Europe by this moratorium; from now on let us see to it that we take care of America, and let us begin first of all by passing a bill to care for the widow and orphan of the veteran, and then pass the cash payment of the soldiers' bonus. Let both be passed early in the session, thereby show the people of America that the country is not ungrateful to the men who fought her battles. [Applause.]

Mr. HAWLEY. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I had not expected to speak this evening until I heard the gentleman from Arkansas, refer to the Germans as the enemies of the United States. I had thought we had gotten over that war hysteria long ago. The great war President Woodrow Wilson repeatedly informed the American people that we had no quarrel with the German people; but that we were making war on the militaristic and autocratic imperial government. Now that Germany has a republic, I think it comes with bad taste, in the House of Representatives, to speak of the enemies of the United States as the German Republic and the German people.

In these few minutes, however, I would like to say a few words about the tragic conditions that exist in the German Republic and commend the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY] for what he has just said about communism in Germany. There are 15,000,000 communists in the German Republic to-day, one-fourth of the entire population, whereas in this country out of 120,000,000 people, there are scarcely half a million. When the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY] tells you about the menace of the communists to the German Republic, he is speaking nothing but the truth.

The seriousness of the situation that exists in that great country at the present time can not be overemphasized. When you say you are giving away something to the German people and to the German Government, you are only giving a holiday of one year on war debts and reparations to provide a breathing spell to the young German republic and save it from communism or fascism. We are not proposing to cancel any of our war loans to any country. The international bankers sent over their high-power salesmen, sent them into every little municipality in Germany, and competed there to sell bonds to those little municipalities to build bridges that they did not need and courthouses that they did not need, in order to make a profit and commission for the big bankers in the United States. We are not altogether blameless for the economic conditions in Germany to-day.

I read in the paper only yesterday—I am not vouching for its accuracy, because it is difficult to believe—that 20 per cent of those Germans who had insurance policies amounting to over 5,000 marks have in the last year committed suicide; that the middle class of Germans are in despair; and that there will be no hope for them unless this moratorium on war indemnities and reparations is granted immediately and they are relieved from the heavy burden of taxes and afforded a ray of hope. No people or no country can exist without hope of economic stability.

If we do not vote for this moratorium, then we help to bring about a revolution in Germany, either toward the right and fascism or toward the left and communism. In either case we will probably lose all the money we have put into Germany and our war debts as well.

Mr. YON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. YON. Does the gentleman think more of Germany than he does of the United States?

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield to me to answer that?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. CONNERY. Everyone in this House knows that the gentleman from New York was an A No. 1 soldier in the American Expeditionary Force in the World War. [Applause.]

Mr. FISH. I will say this to the gentleman, that I do not mind in the least standing up in the House of Representatives and defending the honor and integrity of the young German Republic. [Applause.] I want to see that Republic survive. Its economic stability is essential to world stability and to the peace of the world. I do not want to see it turned toward communism or toward fascism through any action of ours. We brought about the creation of that Republic when we defeated German imperial militarism and autocracy, and I hope we will have no part in causing its overthrow either to the right or to the left by refusing to vote for this moratorium. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. GASQUE.]

Mr. GASQUE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, when I received a telegram from the President of the United States last summer asking whether I would support this moratorium for Germany, without having seen anything in the press or elsewhere, I said to myself and my friends, "This is a step toward the cancellation of the debts of the allied nations in Europe," and I made up my mind then I would oppose this measure before I heard anything else said about it.

The President in his telegram to us intimated that he was not in favor of the cancellation of the war debts. However, every day since, he has been coming nearer and nearer to declaring himself in favor of the cancellation of the war debts.

I shall vote against this resolution for the following reasons:

First. Because I am convinced that the President acted without authority in negotiating with foreign nations on this matter. He violated the Constitution, and he knows it. When I received the President's telegram asking support of his position I immediately tore up the message, refusing even to answer. I saw, and so informed my friends, that this was a movement of the international bankers to cancel all European war debts. The President, however, emphasized in his telegram that this was not true, that he was not in favor of this. Time, however, has told the tale. In his message to Congress he virtually admits that this was what he advocated.

Second. I believe in the adage that charity begins at home. The President seems more interested in Germany than in the great mass of his own or rather our own people. While he and some of his followers claim to be trying to save Germany, thousands of the farms and homes of our American people are being put on the block and sold by the Government of the United States through the farm land-bank agency. Why save Germany and sell out America? What do our people care about foreign nations and charity when they are hungry and destitute? We are breeding communism in this country while trying to save Germany from communism. Our President seems indifferent to conditions in this country, while he seems very much interested in conditions in Europe. Why? I ask you, why? Why has not the President asked for a moratorium for those of our farmers whom the Federal land bank is foreclosing daily because of the conditions brought about by legislation in behalf of greed? Why is he not asking for a moratorium for the millions of farmers and home owners whose homes are being sold daily for taxes? Why is he apparently not interested in saving the thousands of lives who are starving? May I answer? He is more interested in saving the international bankers than he is in saving the people of this great country. I shall vote against this resolution until the President takes some steps or shows that he is first in favor of saving his own country, in favor of saving the homes of our own people.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself nine minutes.

The general proposition has been so well stated by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER], the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], and other gentlemen who have spoken in favor of its passage that I shall not traverse their statements and arguments. There are a few things I wish to add which have not yet been developed.

This resolution is not a moratorium, but proposes that each of the signatory powers shall postpone the collections of moneys due them from others for one year.

Other nations have accepted the leadership of the country and man in whose disinterestedness, good faith, and strength all trust. The United States demanded no reparations. President Hoover administered our assistance once before in their time of necessity. He is probably the only living man who could have united the nations in a movement for mutual relief in this crisis. It is, I think, the outstanding economic and financial program, involving the good will of nations toward each other and their common cooperation in any plan to solve a problem involving great distress and difficulty.

The President is the official designated to communicate with other governments. This he usually does through the agency of the State Department by means of which he prepares proposed international agreements. This agency President Hoover employed in the negotiations which resulted in the proposed agreements embodied in the resolution now under consideration. But the President is not limited to this agency. Since this postponement proposal involves financial considerations, he employed the Treasury Department, the fiscal agency of our Government. We could not ask other nations to temporarily postpone payments due them unless we were willing also to postpone payments due us.

The subject matters to be discussed with other governments is in the discretion of the President. President Hoover, being convinced that the public interests of our Government and the best interests of our people as well as those of other nations would be best so served, instituted the negotiations essential to secure relief for the benefit of the signatory powers, including our own—a practical proposal of great humanity to a large proportion of mankind. This was done that Congress might have definite proposals which would accomplish all that is possible to be done, and that Congress would be assured that what it did would be effective. Having done this preliminary work, he has submitted to Congress directly and through the State and Treasury Departments, with great frankness, the information upon which our action is to be predicated.

Congress is not in a position to conduct such negotiations, nor to have secured the essential concurrence of other nations.

The President has taken only such action as was necessary and incumbent upon him to take, if we, as the leading Nation in the world to-day, are to justify that high and responsible position for the benefit both of our own and all other peoples by means of the relief proposed in the pending resolution, intended to ameliorate the universal distress.

The resolution before us provides for the suspension for one year of payments between governments and the repayment of the moneys now due in 10 annual installments, beginning July 1, 1933. It contains no direct statement, no implication, directly or indirectly, open or concealed, looking to any reduction in the amount of the indebtedness owed to us by any country or a cancellation of such indebtedness due from any country, nor anything else, except the plain proposal that for one year the world as a whole, represented by the great governments and the smaller governments signing the protocol, shall forbear the collection of moneys from each other and let every country remain in statu quo, with its resources and opportunities unimpaired.

Kindly recall the map of Europe in your memories. Early in 1931 in the southeastern part of Europe, banks and financial institutions began to be in trouble and to fail, at first involving 70 per cent of their available working capital. Then failures increased in all those southeastern countries until their credit was seriously impaired and their trade and industries, in distress. They had insufficient capital with which to pay wages, to buy their raw materials, or to operate their industries.

The growing depression then spread into Germany; and that country, which had been steadily building up, suddenly found its credit so greatly impaired, owing to the withdrawal of $850,000,000 in cash and credit, and for other reasons, that its financial system and credit structure were seriously embarrassed and collapse imminent. Other nations gave assistance. The German Government attempted to stem the tide from public resources. The measures were unavailing; Germany had to abandon the gold standard it had adopted after so long a struggle several years before. The dark shadow crossed the channel into England; and that great country, having resources almost unlimited in extent and having its ramifications into every part of the world and of the ocean, was compelled to depart from the gold standard. Following the English disaster 13 countries in all abandoned the gold standard—from Canada and England on the Atlantic to Japan on the Pacific. Departing from the gold standard means that their credit was so impaired, their trade so reduced, and the government's resources so endangered that they could no longer pay a gold dollar in settlement of a debt. The English pound, valued in gold at $4.8665, is quoted in exchange to-day at about $3.30. The postponement of debt payments is a burden on and a benefit to all countries, including our own, but the rehabilitation of other countries will be greatly to our benefit.

The United States is interested in foreign trade. For the four years 1926, 1927, 1928, and 1929 we sold abroad approximately $1,900,000,000 annually; but in 1930, the first year of this present depression, we sold abroad to the countries signing the protocol $450,000,000 less than in the preceding years. Those countries were not able to buy in the usual quantities by reason of their impaired credit and financial resources. They did not have the ability to buy. Their financial condition was such that they could not buy. Germany had 5,000,000 people unemployed; and other nations, in greater proportion on the continent of Europe and in somewhat less proportion in England. They did not have the ability to buy, and their trade with us alone fell off $450,000,000 and with all the world in a much larger amount. This great diminution in our foreign trade, due to the depression abroad, curtailed our trade abroad, to the serious disadvantage of our farmers, our labor, and our industries.

The present year will show a further decline. The disasters of Europe have spread. Her inabilities to transact business have increased. Her people have become less able to purchase the necessities and comforts of life.

No question was ever more thoroughly investigated by a President of the United States than was this question. When it began to be evident that some unusual procedure would be necessary to meet the conditions, not only here but abroad, every diplomatic agency, every commercial agency through the Department of Commerce, and many other agencies, made a survey of the whole field of Europe; and the report from all different and divergent sources contained the same story, that the distress was great and increasing, and the danger of collapse of countries, great and small, was imminent. This threatened collapse in nations with the concomitant suffering of its people, even though later a recovery would be made, presented an appalling spectacle which no humane heart can contemplate without a desire to help.

At that time the President took counsel with the people of the United States, of Congress, and others in the country who had made investigations of economic problems or were engaged in domestic production and foreign trade. He came to the conclusion, after an enormous volume of information, that the proper solution of the problem was in the proposal now before us.

Ladies and gentlemen of the House, the United States has rendered to the world great and immortal services. We established the representative form of government which has taken the world, and after the last great World War, one of its most remarkable and satisfactory results was the downfall of monarchy after monarchy and the establishment of government by the people. We have rendered to the world services that can not be estimated except after a careful, detailed study in the matter of the development of international law, the promotion of peace and the avoidance of war, and the humanizing of the relations between armies in the course of war. We are now confronted with a world in distress, with a world that has taken the proposal that we have submitted, and, since July 31, has acted upon it, anticipating our action. With a world in anguish, people in uncertainty, governments long established and held to be as strong as Gibraltar tottering on their bases, we have a great opportunity to show the world the magnificence of the American spirit, the broadness of our vision, and the greatness and width and depth and height of our humanity. [Applause.]

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU].

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I am under no pledge of any kind to anybody with respect to this resolution. I shall vote exactly as if my vote were the deciding vote to seal the fate of this resolution. Therefore I shall vote for it. [Applause.]

It may be that by passing this resolution beneficial results will follow. We are dealing with a world largely bankrupt and it may be that if we pass this resolution good results will be reflected back into America. So far as I can judge no possible harm can come from passing the legislation, whereas unfortunate results might follow if we defeated the legislation. [Applause.] For one I shall not aid in any attempt to defeat a resolution which may be helpful but which can not do any possible harm.

It is the first of the measures on the program of the President of the United States affecting the economic situation in this country, and I cherish the hope that when the moratorium which he negotiated has been ratified by the Congress of the United States, that the next measures on his program will be for the rehabilitation of our own country. [Applause.] We can not afford to be placed in the attitude of attempting to do something for the remainder of the world while disaster and bankruptcy threaten so many millions of American homes. [Applause.]

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I have recently introduced a bill which looks toward the end that the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina has just suggested, namely, to provide for a moratorium of two years to the farmers of America on mortgages to the Federal land banks. This bill is as follows:

H. R. 6008

A bill to make provision for extending the time for making payments under loans from Federal land banks, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That the time for the payment of any installment due and payable to any Federal land bank prior to one year after the enactment of this act, under the terms of any mortgage securing a loan made by such bank, may, at the request of the person from whom such installment is due, be extended by such bank for a period of not more than two years; except that this act shall not be construed to authorize extension of the time for payment of any installment under a mortgage in respect of which a foreclosure proceeding has been instituted.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to make advances, within the limits of appropriations hereafter made for such purpose, to Federal land banks of amounts equal to installments in respect of which extensions of time have been granted as authorized in section 1. The bank to which any such advance is made shall repay the same to the United States, without interest, within such time, in such manner, and under such terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury and the Federal Farm Loan Board, acting jointly, may prescribe. Amounts so repaid shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

My colleagues, until such time as action is taken on that bill, I feel that the Congress should proceed very cautiously in its charity to foreign nations.

Somehow I was impressed by the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] in regard to the suggestion that the middle-class of Germany is on the verge of ruin. I would like to remind my colleague that with 4 per cent of the American people in possession of 80 per cent of the wealth of the country, and with a few industrialists and the international bankers of the country—and I hold no enmity against them—intrigued with foreign countries to protect their own investments, our own middle-class is in danger of its existence. These financiers and bankers favor the cancellation of debts to our American Government. I feel that we should first look out for the plain American taxpayers. [Applause.]

Thousands of our American farmers are losing their farms to the Federal Government on account of the foreclosures of these Federal land bank mortgages. They are entitled to an extension of time on payment. It is impossible for them, many of them, to meet the obligations on their mortgages. After foreclosure the land banks are unable to promptly dispose of the lands; in fact, the banks do not need or desire the lands; therefore we should extend these farmers the courtesy and assistance that these capitalists and international bankers desire to extend to our foreign country debtors. With me, our own American citizens come first. I oppose a moratorium to foreign countries until after a moratorium is extended to our own citizens; in fact, I am opposed to any moratorium that may lead to further cancellation of our foreign debts.

I shall soon see how many of my colleagues will soon vote for my farm-loan moratorium, as it is very apparent that the matter may soon come up for your approval or disapproval. I hope you will stand with me in the interest of our own depressed farmers.

My friends, to-day I listened with much interest to the splendid speech of the eloquent young lawyer from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON]. He well carries on for the great Henry Clay, of Kentucky, and also to that finished statesman and jurist, Judge ESLICK, of Tennessee, as well as the sane and conservative gentleman from Texas [Mr. SANDERS], and these gentlemen all advised us that in the deliberations of the Ways and Means Committee it was never made apparent to them that the foreign nations are on the verge of failing to pay their payments now falling due. On the other hand, they believe, it appears, that these foreign nations are able to pay, and in fact have not all asked for the moratorium, so why this uncalled for generosity of America.

From the information they gave us on the floor to-day, it is very apparent that the foreign nations have no intention at this time of refusing to pay, or in fact were not able to pay their debts to the American Government.

With a near two billion dollar deficit in our Treasury and 7,000,000 people unemployed, with our President and the Congress now looking to the rehabilitation of the country through home building, how we can believe it is sane economy and good American statesmanship for us to be more generous to our foreign neighbors than we are to those whom we represent in this chamber is beyond my understanding. [Applause.]

The American people are already groaning under the present burden of taxation; yes, taxation from municipality to Federal tax. Cancellation of debts owed the Government by foreign nations will in the end bring additional tax on our people to meet the Government's obligations. Gentlemen, in the name of fairness and good common sense I beg you not pile additional tax burdens on my people. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, how does the time now stand?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi has 13 minutes remaining, the gentleman from Texas 5 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Oregon 2 minutes remaining.

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GILBERT].

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Chairman, if I answered the telegram from the President of the United States, which I think I did not, it was under the impression that there had suddenly arisen a situation to be sustained by irrefutable evidence that Germany was in a state of collapse.

I came into this discussion with the intention of supporting this measure. The debate is about to close. The majority members of the Ways and Means Committee, who are the proponents of the measure, and upon whom the burden of proof naturally rests, have utterly failed to give us, who want to support the President, any excuse whatever for doing so. On the contrary, the committee, organized under the Young plan, with greater facilities for finding out the conditions, report that Germany is able to pay; and it is current in the press that Germany, having borrowed from this country more money than has been paid on her debts to this country, used that money in the reestablishment of her industries, is now one of our main competitors in the markets of the world, and to-day has a larger export trade than the United States. I say to the members of the Ways and Means Committee that they owe a duty to this House and to the Members like myself who want to support the President, to give us in the regular way proper proof upon which we could act. On the contrary, we are informed by able lawyers like my colleague from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SANDERS] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ESLICK] that there is not a line of proof introduced before that committee, showing either that Germany is unable to pay, or has initiated this movement for a moratorium. On the contrary the only committee with facilities to learn the truth finds that Germany is able to pay.

It is true that the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. RAGON] said that there is a mystery about this. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] says that he and a certain group with whom he was associated have secured proof. That is not a fair way to present a great matter before this House, and that Members like myself, who have no secret information that others seem to have and who are not enveloped in any mystery, ought to be informed of. Those of us who sincerely want to support the President, who have never indulged in any criticism against him, are entitled to proof introduced before that committee by the statements of witnesses on the condition of Germany's ability to pay.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILBERT. I have not the time. They intimate that there is a responsibility upon us to follow others, including the President of the United States and those high in responsibility in state affairs. I dissent and assert that wherever the Constitution of the United States places a duty upon me to vote, I say it does not deny to me the right to information so that I may exercise that responsibility intelligently.

This is only a question of fact, as we are all equally patriotic, and those upon whom fell the duty to present facts justifying us in breaking a solemn contract have miserably failed to produce such facts. So I must, upon the hearing had, vote against surrendering our rights and transferring to the taxpayers of my country a burden due from another equally able to bear it. [Applause.]

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP].

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I rise to say in answer to the remarks of my friend who has just concluded, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GILBERT], that there are extensive hearings here. If he will read the hearings that were out this morning, he will find the testimony of the Under Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of State. They fully go into the economic condition of Germany, not in 1920, as some gentlemen who have spoken here to-day said, but they showed the economic condition of Germany starting in May, 1931, and bringing it up to the date of the moratorium. That is all I have to say.

Mr. GILBERT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. GILBERT. Have all of the hearings on this matter been printed?

Mr. CRISP. So far as I know, and the committee moved as fast as it could, the evidence has been printed, except the testimony of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN], the testimony of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN], and I think possibly the testimony of Mr. Davidson, the representative of J. P. Morgan & Co., and his testimony simply said that his firm had no instructions or moneys from foreign governments to meet these payments, and that matter is extraneous and immaterial and has no bearing on this issue.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. FISH. Was it brought out at the hearings that the amount of export trade from Germany to Soviet Russia was $200,000,000 this year, for which they have not been paid?

Mr. CRISP. It was not. It was stated before the committee that possibly some of the German industrialists had made advances to Russia to obtain trade, just as other European countries had made loans in Russia for the same purpose, but the testimony was that in the opinion of the responsible officials of the Government, the amount loaned from Germany into Russia had been grossly exaggerated.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCKEOWN].

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of the time on this side to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCKEOWN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for 11 minutes.

Mr. MCKEOWN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, politics have never settled an economic question and never will settle an economic question. The makers of the Constitution were wise in their generation, because it is evident from the proceedings here to-day that it would not have done to place the conduct of foreign affairs in the House of Representatives. [Applause and laughter.] This is not a political question, but it is an economic question. The best illustration I can make of it is this. Let us suppose there is in your community a very rich man who has been lending money to his neighbors. His neighbors come in and say to him that they have had a bad crop and that they can not pay him this year and would like to have an extension of their debt for another year. What kind of a citizen would he be, if he could do it, if he would not extend the debts? We hear of men trying to get out of their obligation to support the President by telegram through saying that they agreed to support him in the moratorium for one year, but that now it is a 10-year proposition. There is no 10-year proposition save as to the postponed payment and interest in this case.

It is one year, and the truth about the matter is that if we all knew the real facts, those of you who are most vehement against this extension would be on the floor saying one year is not sufficient and that we ought to give Germany and the rest of Europe an opportunity to recover. Talk about conditions in this country! Yes; conditions in this country are bad. I charged the Republican leaders with a lot of it; but if you defeat this moratorium and the civilization of the world breaks down, then it will be upon the Democrats who voted against this resolution.

You do not think it will happen? Very well. Let us see. I am not going back to Oklahoma and say that I did not know what I was doing when I sent a telegram to the President of the United States saying that I would vote for this moratorium. [Applause.]

I have never pleaded guilty to ignorance at home. I am not going to plead guilty to ignorance here. We have a right to rely upon the President of the United States. He is the Chief Executive of the Nation. I do not care whether you like him personally or dislike him. I do not care whether you like him politically or not. He is the President of the United States. He is the man vested with the power, under the Constitution, to negotiate the foreign relations of this country. [Applause.]

He is the man who is supposed to do it. I was just an unsophisticated country Congressman out in Oklahoma when I received the telegram from the President, the first one I ever did receive from the President of the United States. [Laughter and applause.] I did not know what the condition in Europe was, but I knew what the condition was in Oklahoma. I knew that if Europe was as bad as they said she was, as compared with the conditions in Oklahoma, it was time somebody was extending obligations, and I thought I would not confine my sympathy only to the poor debtors in my district, but I was willing to extend it to other poor people.

Now, I do not fall out with my friends who vote the other way. I never did try to beat some fellow because he voted different than I did. I believe that every man in this House votes according to the dictates of his conscience. That is the way I vote, and I am not afraid to vote the dictates of my conscience because this Irishman will not break his word to the President of the United States or anybody else, if he knows it. [Applause.]

I knew that over there in Europe when President Wilson was making the treaty of Versailles that certain burdens were laid upon the German people, and I knew that politics played a great hand in the great treaty of Versailles, because economics were not considered, and they laid a stupendous burden upon the German people. They laid upon the German people a burden of 132,000,000,000 marks. That is the burden they laid upon the German Government. Not only that, but under the Dawes plan they put Germany in the hands of a receiver. They took a receivership on Germany. France was not satisfied. France put her soldiers in the Ruhr in order to get coal and iron. France found that you could not, by arms, settle economic questions, but it was not until 1928, under the Young plan, when they removed the receivership from Germany, that they set aside the receivership and gave Germany an opportunity to pay.

Oh, they talk about this going to be an extension of the debt. Many of my good brothers say, "I would vote for this, but I am afraid it is going to commit me to a policy of canceling the debts."

My brother, I voted on every one of these debt settlements, and I followed the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi in voting against these debt settlements, and I am to-day following the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER], the brilliant orator that he is, on this matter. [Applause.]

Ladies and gentlemen, this is a serious matter. It is serious because the Executive officer of this Government, the man empowered by the Constitution with the authority, has made an agreement, and he made that agreement upon the assumption that the Congress of the United States, when it convened, would ratify it. I have heard gentlemen say that he should have called us into session in October. Personally I am very glad he did not. We would not have had control if he had not waited until December. [Laughter and applause.] Whether it is good policy to do it that way or not I am not going to say.

The right to call Congress into session is a constitutional right given to the President. It is not for me to say whether he should exercise that right or not. I think he made a mistake, but that is not for me to say. That is his judgment.

Gentlemen say that they are going to beat everybody who votes for this moratorium. I am not going to make any speeches in your district, gentlemen. I published the telegram that I sent to the President, and I published the statement I made, and I will tell you what many of the farmers of my district said. They came in and said, "TOM MCKEOWN, you are right. If you can help the world get better, where we can sell our cotton and our wheat and our hogs and cattle, you will do the best thing you could do for this country. We have to have a chance."

We have got to have a chance. I want to tell you gentlemen who come from the great cotton districts of this country that you want to think twice before you vote and go on record against this program, because, under the present high tariffs of this country, you can not trade and carry on commerce with the nations of the world. Under the present isolation policy you can not carry on commerce now and they can not buy. You are just going to shut the door. Who wants to see the great Government of the United States torn down? And who wants to see this civilization destroyed and have bolshevism set up in its place? [Applause.]

(Mr. McKEOWN asked and was granted permission to include in his remarks the following telegram:)

To the PRESIDENT,
The White House, Washington, D. C.:
Will support your proposal to postpone all intergovernment debts for one year. Personally, I feel that all debtor nations should be required to reduce military expenditures so that no further extensions will be required. Also believe arrangements should be made to postpone Federal land bank foreclosures for a like period.

TOM D. MCKEOWN, M. C.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. Is there any parliamentary way by which we can get a vote on what is known as the Ragon amendment which the committee added to the resolution?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not familiar with the contents of the amendment, and, therefore, can not give an opinion with reference to it.

Mr. BLANTON. It is section 5 of the resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think he is called upon to anticipate a ruling upon that matter. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman that he can get a direct vote on that proposition by moving to strike it from the resolution.

Mr. BLANTON. We are in favor of it and do not want to strike it out.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. The resolution will be considered by sections under the 5-minute rule. The Clerk will read the resolution for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. Each such agreement on behalf of the United States shall provide for the payment of the postponed amounts, with interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum beginning July 1, 1933, in 10 equal annuities, the first to be paid during the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1933, and one during each of the nine fiscal years following, each annuity to be payable in one or more installments.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I am one of those Members of Congress who have consistently voted against all of the foreign debt-funding agreements considered during my term of service, and I have spoken extensively in opposition to such agreements because I thought they were too liberal. I was somewhat surprised to hear the clarion voices of our Democratic colleagues raising the cry about international bankers while presenting their opposition to the pending measure. I yield now to the gentleman from Mississippi and some of the others afflicted with international-banker hydrophobia to ascertain if they refer to the same international bankers who had billions of dollars invested in foreign loans prior to the World War and who were the moving power which drove a Democratic administration into said war, which is responsible for most of the existing depression throughout the Nation.

Anyone following the debate on this important international question must have been impressed, as I was certainly impressed, by orations of our Democratic statesmen, such as the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER], the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], and my good friend, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. RAGON], who spoke in favor of the pending measure.

Anyone who reads the debates on this important question will not have any hesitation in reaching a decision that the present occupant of the White House will go down in history as one of the greatest Presidents in our history. [Applause.]

While I differ with him on some policies, I do not agree with many of my colleagues on the other side of the aisle who in the past have claimed to be champions of State rights and who now take advantage of a world-wide depression to preach bureaucracy and centralization of government and condemn the President of the United States for a multitude of ills over which he has no jurisdiction or control. I expect to see some of our Democratic politicians rise on the floor of Congress and condemn the President of the United States for the drought which caused the loss of thousands of lives throughout the country.

When I consider the facts in connection with this great international problem which is now pending, when I study the leading part taken by the President of the United States, I am proud that I was one of those who went before the people in the last presidential election campaign and advocated his election. I sincerely hope that all of the Republicans in the House will support the President and vote for the pending bill providing for a foreign debt moratorium. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. It is hereby expressly declared to be against the policy of Congress that any of the indebtedness of foreign countries to the United States should be in any manner canceled or reduced, and nothing in this joint resolution shall be construed as indicating a contrary policy, or as implying that favorable consideration will be given at any time to a change in the policy hereby declared.

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. SANDERS of Texas: Amend by adding section No. 6, as follows:
"That for a period of two years from the date of the approval of this act all Federal land banks are authorized and directed, subject to approval of the Federal Farm Board (1) to withhold foreclosure of any mortgage securing a loan made by such bank if the borrower is in default under the terms of the mortgage, and (2) to extend the time for the payment of any installment due or to become due under the terms of any such mortgage for a period of not to exceed two years."

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the subject matter of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SANDERS] desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. No; I do not want to be heard, but I would like to have my amendment read in its entirety.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PARSONS: Page 3, add a new paragraph, as follows:
"SEC. 6. This agreement shall be predicated on the reduction of military and naval expenditures by the various governments in an amount equal to twice the amount of the payment postponed by the United States."

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I am constrained to make a point of order against the amendment, in that it is irrelevant and not germane to the bill before the House for consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. PARSONS. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BANKHEAD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration House Joint Resolution 147, to authorize the postponement of amounts payable to the United States from foreign governments during the fiscal year 1932, and their repayment over a 10-year period beginning July 1, 1933, and had directed him to report the same back with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution to its final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the resolution with instructions to the committee to report it back forthwith with all the bill stricken out except section 5.

The SPEAKER. Is there any gentleman on the committee who is opposed to the bill and desires to make a motion to recommit? If not, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Texas to make the motion, if he declares that he is opposed to the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. I am.

Mr. CRISP. I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BLANTON moves to recommit the joint resolution to the Committee on Ways and Means with instructions to report it back forthwith with an amendment striking out all of the resolution except section 5.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were 21 ayes and 263 noes.

So the motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the resolution.

Mr. CRISP. And on that, Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 318, nays 100, not voting 14, as follows:

NOT VOTING—14

Beck	Hull, William E.	Maas	Weaver
Britten	Kopp	Peavey	Welsh, Pa.
Cochran, Pa.	Lehlbach	Reid, Ill.
Fulmer	McSwain	Swick

So the resolution was agreed to.

The Clerk announced the following pair:

Mr. Reid of Illinois (for) with Mr. McSwain (against).

General pairs:

Mr. Fulmer with Mr. William E. Hull.
Mr. Weaver with Mr. Beck.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. COLLIER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. MAAS, of Minnesota, is ill. He has directed me to say that if it were possible for him to be here and vote on this resolution he would have voted "yea."

Mr. DARROW. Mr. Speaker, my colleagues, Messrs. COCHRAN of Pennsylvania, SWICK, WELSH of Pennsylvania, and BECK are unavoidably absent. If present, they would all have voted "yea."

Mr. COLE. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. KOPP, was compelled to go home on account of illness. He has asked me to state that if he were present he would have voted "yea."

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL, was called to Illinois this afternoon, and asked me to state that if present he would have voted "yea."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS—FOREIGN-DEBT MORATORIUM

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I wish to state in the beginning that it is my purpose to vote against this foreign-debt moratorium. I believe the passage of the resolution would be the entering wedge for eventual cancellation of our foreign debts. The people of the United States are perhaps less able at this time to extend financial aid to our European neighbors than at any time in the history of our country. So long as our women and children, not only in my section of the country but in every other section, are suffering, in many cases, because the breadwinner of the family is unemployed and not able to make a support for the family, and while there is unparalleled poverty and want in my State, as well as in the other States, I can not consent for these United States to treat foreigners with more consideration than they are able to treat our own people.

Even though the moratorium did not mean cancellation in the end, I could not vote to extend credit for an additional 10 years to those European nations that are indebted to us on payments that are due at this time, because in order to do so will require the collection of more than $250,000,000 from our people in additional taxes. If we are to cancel or postpone the collection of more than $250,000,000 of our foreign indebtedness, we must find elsewhere an equal amount of money to pay the expenses of operating our own Government. I know of no place to get this money except from the taxpayers of the country. I figure that to postpone the collection of these debts at this time would require the collection of $2 extra tax for every man, woman, and child in the United States.

I can not subscribe to the doctrine of the President, when in his message to the Congress he advocates in one breath this moratorium and in the next breath demands of the Congress that taxes be increased all down the line in order that our huge deficit in the Treasury, which is mounting steadily, may be wiped out. In voting "no" on this suggested moratorium, I realize that many of the leaders of my party are going to cast their votes in the affirmative. I dislike to refuse to follow the leadership of men whose judgment and ability have been tested and proved to be sound.

In this particular instance, I am of the opinion that many of these leaders are voting for the foreign-debt moratorium because of pledges that they have made to the President. Under these circumstances they probably should vote in the affirmative, but as for me, I have not pledged myself nor obligated myself to any man or set of men except the people of the first congressional district of Georgia whom I have the honor to represent in this House.

In casting my vote against this moratorium I am doing it in the interest of every man, woman, and child who happens to live in that great section of our country. There are so many needy people in the United States at this time that I can not agree to support a measure that has for its purpose the alleviation of conditions that exist in the European countries, which, in my opinion, are not as terrible as the want, poverty, and suffering that are in existence in our own country. Until the widows and orphans of those who made the supreme sacrifice for our country have been taken care of and until the masses of our own people are placed in a more fortunate situation than the one they occupy to-day I can not advocate or vote for any measure that will give financial aid to people of other countries, some of whom have recently been our enemies, when such assistance can only be granted by increasing the tax burdens of the unfortunate masses of our own people.

Mr. LARRABEE. Mr. Speaker, this is a brief presentation of the mandate of a large and honorable block of citizens of my district and of the people who border on my district in counties represented by my worthy colleagues.

I shall not waste time with preliminary formalities. The message I bring from the people I represent is plain and demands the most prudent consideration. Their mandate, in fact, is this: That there be no favorable action on the moratorium until they are assured that the Seventy-second Congress will take action favorable to their own relief.

From my district come to my desk numerous telegrams and letters, directed to me, and to the Seventy-second Congress, in which the pleas of those who offered, and in many cases gave, of their very blood on foreign soil—pleas that I and my colleagues here assembled withhold action on the proposed moratorium until consideration, justly due, has been given the obligation we owe the heroes of our own soil.

Veterans of military service on foreign soil have requested Congress for favorable action on payment of the bonus, an obligation which this Government has long since acknowledged it unquestionably owes them.

They resent our talk here of a moratorium to foreign nations while we neglect to act upon our obligation to them. They have requested, in all sincerity and with patriotic views, that consideration be given the obligation this Nation owes them—owes them in actual cash. They have pleaded for consideration for their wives, for the widows of their fallen comrades.

Thus far they have seen only the object of their prayers pushed to the background while the pleas of foreign nations for aid in a financial way have been dragged to the front.

While they have been pleading for aid from their own Government, the one Government they have a right to expect to provide them with the full payment of the debt owing to them, they have heard that Government attempting to tell them that our Treasury is depleted, that no money is available nor will it be available. At the same time they have been asked to step aside with their pleas for their rights, while efforts were being made by their Government to extend to foreign nations all the financial aid that the amiable representatives of those nations have requested.

Our duty is clear, gentlemen of the Seventy-second Congress. We have an obligation to the people of our own land.

We have a gigantic obligation not only to the former soldier but an obligation to the common man and the common woman—an obligation to those who labor in the fields of agriculture, in the shops of industry, in the avenues of commerce, and in the establishments of business, and that obligation is to first take action in behalf of our own people.

I resent very much being asked to cast one of my first votes in Congress for measures that are designed and admitted to be designed for the relief of the people of foreign nations, while I know that back home in my district not hundreds but thousands of people are bitterly suffering from the effect of unemployment.

The people of my district and the people in the district of every Member of Congress have a right to believe and expect that Congress will act first in their behalf, and that, gentlemen, is exactly what they do expect.

They sent us here to look after their affairs. That is the obligation we have to the people of our own land.

Foreign nations have an obligation to us, an obligation that they contracted themselves. The question of whether or not they recognize and fulfill that obligation has a very vital bearing on the question of this Government's ability to fulfill its obligation to our people.

It is not becoming of us to shirk our duty. It is far less becoming of us to sanction, much less invite, foreign nations to forego their obligation at a time when, as our President has said, our own cupboard of finance is bare.

We have the prosperity of these United States to look after first. We have the obligation we owe our own people to pay. We have a duty to the wives and widows of those who fought the battles of war that we must not forget.

If it be true, as we have been led to believe, that this Nation can not afford to pay its obligation to its fighting manhood, then it is unquestionably true that we have no right and can not afford to encourage foreign nations to forget—even for one year—the millions each one of several foreign nations owes to the United States.

Shall this Congress brand itself with the unsavory mark of robbery? Shall we take from the pockets of our own people to fill the pockets of those who already have received more than generous aid from our Nation? Shall we deny the widows and families of those men who went across the sea to fight the battle of democracy that which is theirs, that we may return prosperity to foreign lands first? If that be our duty here, gentlemen, I have failed to be convinced.

Where is there a man in this hall who believes the structure of this Government so frail that it can not longer stand without paying further tribute in millions of dollars to those nations we have already once saved from destruction? Where is there a Member of Congress who sincerely and honestly feels we must neglect our sacred duty to our own flesh and blood if we are to come from the brink of chaos to which we have been submerged?

I demand of you, my colleagues, that you pay heed to the pitiful pleas for help from our own people first.

I am not opposed to charity, but better judgment tells me our charity must start at home.

I call your attention to the fact that those heroes who offered their lives on foreign soil are not asking for charity. They want nothing that is not due them. They want only that their Government fulfill its pledge made to them with the passage of the soldiers' bonus law.

They want only consideration for their wives and the widows of their comrades that not a man among us can deny is due them.

They have an unquestionable right to oppose any effort of any body—Congress or what not—to deny them their bonus while at the same time an administration is attempting to transfer the burden of the late war to the shoulders of our own people.

This Nation has spent billions, yes, $38,837,000,000, in the defense of what we felt was a sacred right. Now, shall we assume to spend additional billions in tribute while we fail to pay our obligation at home?

Shall we set up for the eyes of coming generations the spectre of a nation afraid to meet its obligation to its own people? Shall we paint for posterity a picture of a country so weak in its vision that it can not see what is going on at home—see the suffering and poverty here—while reaching across the sea in a false gesture of charity?

Happiness and prosperity can not be brought to live again until this Nation and all other nations under the sun come to realize that there are obligations more sacred than those of false pride and false charity.

We must realize now our obligations and our duty at home, conditions within the borders of our own Nation. We must pay our own obligations, and in all sincerity, yet with a spirit of kindliness, request other nations pay their obligations to us.

We must correct the disorder at home before we can hope to extend any semblance of aid across the sea. Any effort to take from the shoulders of those who owe us honest obligations that burden and heap it upon the shoulders of our already heavily overburdened people is doomed to failure.

It will breed chaos here—within our own borders—such as the civilized world has never known.

Let us heed the warning. Let us harken to the pleas of our own people. Let us reason for our own welfare before it is too late.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Speaker, ever since the President proposed the 1-year moratorium for the debts due from foreign governments to the United States, I have endeavored to get at the basic facts upon which an intelligent judgment should be based.

That there has been much distress under foreign flags we must concede. We also know that foreign governments have had great difficulty in balancing their budgets and that a considerable number have been forced off the gold standard. But, even so, I am not aware that any foreign government has asked for the moratorium or given notice of inability to meet its payments. None are in default except those that were given to understand that they need not pay on December 15 in anticipation of the approval of the moratorium by Congress. That being the case, the proposed postponement of payments due us for one year does not appear to be imperative so far as our debtors are concerned.

What, then, is the indispensable necessity for the moratorium? The reason given is to save Germany from open and declared bankruptcy and a total collapse of her whole financial structure. A dark picture has been painted of the poverty of her people and the danger of their seeking relief in Bolshevism and the repudiation of foreign obligations, both public and private.

While the proposed moratorium is coupled with a provision that our debtors shall extend a like moratorium to Germany, the only country that suffers is the United States. If we forego payment to France and England, for example, and they in turn forego payment from Germany, they sacrifice nothing; but we owe no one and no one will give us anything in return for our generosity. In other words, we become the sacrificial goat for the benefit of other nations to the extent of $252,000,000, which I understand is the amount involved in the moratorium.

We have already made huge sacrifices for Europe. Our own people are themselves weighed down with a heavy tax load, to which must be added additional levies for relief work and to take up the huge deficit in the National Treasury. From every part of the country come cries for relief and for moratoriums for taxes, interest, and installment payments on debts. Shall we neglect these that foreign countries may be aided? Were times prosperous here, the situation would be different, but I believe that most of our debtors are quite as able to pay as we are to forego payment.

Such deferment has already been seized upon by our debtors as the entering wedge for downward revision or cancellation of their obligations to this country. It is idle to contend that it is not the first step in such a program in the minds of those who owe us. Not only in their minds, but in the minds of our international banking groups who are anxious to make more certain the repayment of advancements made by them at the expense of the American taxpayers. To this program I am unalterably opposed and shall therefore cast my vote against the resolution.

If European countries will cut down their armaments and compose the differences with their neighbors, they will not find it especially difficult to pay, even if payment of reparations from Germany should temporarily cease.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, there will be no more important question presented to this Congress than the President's proposal for the postponement of the payment of intergovernmental debts, commonly, but I think mistakenly termed the "moratorium."

It is a question pregnant with great responsibility to us as representatives of the people, a question fraught with the gravest concern to the future weal of our country, for it not only vitally and balefully affects the present economic distress of our people but, as well, our future conduct in regard to entangling foreign alliances.

We are asked blindly to give our support to the proposal because it is recommended by the executive department of the Government.

While I have the greatest respect for our executive department and its pronouncements, I also am persuaded that this department of our Government under the Constitution is left free, within certain limitations, to crystallize its views into legislative enactment. Before passing final judgment upon a question of so great and vital importance to the American people, Congress is entitled to and should have all information upon the subject possessed by the executive department.

If there are any secret understandings or reservations bearing upon the proposal or its interpretation, they should be revealed to Congress in order that it may properly safeguard the rights of the American people. Congress must know whether there is an understanding with the governments concerned that the proposal which at first was understood by the American public to be a moratorium for one year on the payment of intergovernmental debts is in fact intended to culminate in the cancellation of all foreign debts.

Mr. Speaker, last June the President proposed to the country that the payment of all intergovernmental debts be postponed for a period of one year. Detailed information touching this subject was withheld from the public and it and the Members of Congress anxiously awaited the President's message in the hope that it would give the information which would show why it was expedient to place a further burden upon our people for the benefit of foreign obligors or of the international bankers and private holders of foreign obligations, whose debts were carefully excepted from the operation of the proposed moratorium.

Last week the President delivered to this Congress his message upon this subject. The message was shrouded in a superabundance of glittering generalities, but it was lacking in definiteness and certainty in regard to the specific transactions relative to the proposal for such moratorium.

Mr. Speaker, as a lawyer, my first thought was that it would be beneficial if a motion to make more definite and certain were permissible.

A reading of the message and related records reveals certain facts. Something had happened, we are not informed what, between June and the date of the President's message which had changed conditions.

The message instead of proposing a 1-year moratorium on intergovernmental debts, when viewed with all of the implications and its acceptance by the foreign press, proposed the first step toward the cancellation of all foreign debts.

To show that the proposal now submitted by the President connotes cancellation of the foreign debts, I quote the following language used by the President in said message:

> In June I informed the governments concerned, "The American Government proposes the postponement during one year of all payments on intergovernmental debts, reparation and relief debts, both principal and interest, of course, not including obligations of government held by private parties.

Again continuing his message, the President says:

> As we approach the new year it is clear that a number of the governments indebted to us will be unable to meet further payments to us in full, pending a recovery in their economic life. It is useless to blind ourselves to an obvious fact. Therefore it will be necessary in some cases to make still further temporary adjustments.

Thus the question now submitted is not a moratorium but a cancellation of the foreign debts.

The report of the Secretary of the Treasury shows that as of date November 15, 1931, the total amount of debts owed the United States by foreign countries was $11,598,501,420. That of this stupendous debt, France owed $5,863,650,000, England owed $4,398,000,000, and Italy owed $2,004,900,000. Thus it is seen that of the approximately eleven and one-half billions of dollars of debts sought to be canceled, France, England, and Italy, three of the wealthy nations of the world, owe the United States approximately ten and one-fourth billions of dollars. The proposal, if foreign debts are canceled, is that the people of the United States give to England, France, and Italy ten and one-fourth billions of dollars. Under the proposal the United States is the only nation that would sacrifice a dollar, for France says that for every dollar she reduces her reparations there must be a corresponding reduction in the debt to the United States.

The obligations of the foreign countries to the United States might be canceled, but there is no proposal and there is no way for the United States to cancel its obligations to the holders thereof, which public obligations were incurred in behalf of England, France, Italy, and the other foreign countries. It is known that at the time of the original adjustment of war obligations the United States sacrificed more than seven billions of dollars in the amount justly due her.

According to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury as of date June 30, 1931, the money cost of the World War to the United States on June 21, 1931, was $26,361,096,001.09, and the continuing costs of the war since that date to June 30, 1931, have amounted to $12,797,553,008.48, making the total money cost of the World War to the United States the sum of $39,158,649,009.57. This stupendous money cost to the United States was incurred in a foreign war, brought about by foreign countries, and fought in foreign lands.

The United States loaned to the Allies money and furnished them soldiers to help them win the war. At the close of the war many of the victorious nations, who had loudly proclaimed their only purpose to be to crush the war god, at once sought territorial aggrandizement and the spoils of war in the way of vast reparations adjustments from the vanquished and prostrate foe. It can not be denied that some of the Allies have received reparation awards which are unjust, oppressive, and doubtless beyond the ability of Germany to pay. The United States asked no spoils of war. She did not ask the repayment of the actual money cost of the war. We had borrowed money from the American people in the way of Liberty loans and then loaned this money to France, England, Italy, and our other allies. These nations now owe us approximately $11,500,000,000 of this debt and our Government owes the same, and it must be paid by the American people or our foreign debtors to the holders of Liberty bonds and the other obligations of the United States.

It is reported that Great Britain and other debtor nations at the first of this week had their money here ready to pay the installments due on their debts, but they did not pay same because our Government did not seem to want the money. It is now contemplated that these foreign debts be readjusted and ultimately canceled.

Do France, England, and Italy want the United States to give them these ten and one-fourth billions of dollars so that they may continue to build vast armaments of war in preparation for another great carnage and slaughter of human life? Conceivably this is true, for the President in his message says:

> The burden of taxes to support armaments is greater to-day than before the Great War.

According to the recent report of the Foreign Policy Association, the seven great powers of the world in the year 1930 expended the vast sum of $2,958,000,000 for war armament. In 1930 these seven great powers spent 30 per cent more for armaments of war than they spent in 1926 and 37 per cent more than the same powers spent in the prewar year of 1913. Excluding Germany, the remaining six great powers spent 65 per cent more for war armament in 1930 than in 1913. We are now asked to cancel the war debts of France, England, Italy, and the other foreign nations and compel the American people to pay such debts in order that those foreign nations may continue the development of great war armaments.

The money contribution was not our greatest contribution to the war. We gave to our allies and their cause countless thousands of the bravest soldiers who ever bore arms in defense of their country. In a foreign land, with the courageous challenge "They shall not pass," our boys won the war.

Countless thousands of these lads now sleep in Flanders Field as part of our Nation's sacrifice to a foreign war-mad world. Our gold-star mothers still stand with tear-stained eyes and aching hearts in the presence of their supreme sacrifice.

Mr. Speaker, the mothers and the fathers of our land whom we represent surely counsel that we not give these $11,000,000,000 to the foreign countries so that they will be enabled to continue to build great armaments of war. [Applause.]

The cancellation of debts will benefit England, France, Italy, their allies, and the great international bankers, who want the American public to pay foreign obligations owned by them.

Our farmers to-day are facing ruin and bankruptcy. When they ask help from the Government they are turned away empty handed. Then when their obligations to the Government for seed loans come due, they are offered no postponement in the payment of such debts. Thousands of our farmers because of the inimical policies of the hostile Farm Board have seen their homes swept from them under foreclosure proceedings.

Six million honest laborers, with countless millions of good women and innocent little children depending upon them for support, are out of work through no fault of their own. They are walking our streets seeking just enough work to drive hunger and cold away. When they ask help from the Government, it tells them there can be no Government help.

Our Nation should ever be grateful to our ex-service men who offered their lives in defense of our country, yet when they seek payment of the debt which is justly due them the Government tells them that the Treasury can not stand the burden that would be imposed by such payment.

Mr. Speaker, these are American needs which first must be met. [Applause.]

We are advised that the Nation is approaching a deficit of approximately $2,000,000,000 at the end of the fiscal year, and that the taxes upon the people must be heavily increased to meet the current expenses of the Government.

I have an abiding sympathy for all foreign countries in distress, but certainly it is the duty of our Government first to relieve the distress among our own people.

There are many thousands of people of German descent in our country. They are a part of the best and most substantial citizens of our Nation, but they too are suffering from the terrible financial and economic depression in our land. They do not want this Government to give England, France, Italy, and their allies $11,000,000,000 and to saddle this obligation onto them and their children.

Personally, I believe that some of the victorious Allies at the close of the war exacted from Germany, in her then helpless condition, unjust and unfair reparation awards which have all but crushed the German nation. If they are desirous of seeing a just adjustment of intergovernmental obligations, they should announce that they will cancel or reduce the obligation that Germany owes to them without asking that the American people pay them the amount of such reduction.

Real relief may be offered to Germany and at the same time to the American people by a reciprocal readjustment with the foreign nations of the iniquitous tariff schedules and laws which have closed the channels of foreign commerce to the products of American soil and American factories.

Our people are now groaning under the weight of the excessive taxes which have been imposed upon them. The entire Nation is standing in the abysmal and murky depth of the worst economic depression and panic it has ever faced.

I can not support a proposal to cancel the ten and one-fourth billions of dollars of debt owed our Government by France, England, and Italy, all of whom are financially able to pay the debt owed by them. The approval of such unjust proposal would place upon the already overtaxed American people a burden which they can not and must not bear. [Applause.]

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Speaker, I favor the ratification by Congress of President Hoover's 1-year moratorium to our European debtors. Last June I telegraphed President Hoover that I favored his proposal to grant a year's moratorium to our European debtors, and I have heard nothing in the debate on the resolution, reported by the Ways and Means Committee approving the President's action, that would lead me to change my views on the foreign-debt proposition.

Much of the discussion in this debate has no relevancy whatever to the merits of President Hoover's moratorium. We all know that we are passing through a serious industrial crisis in this country. We all know that we have millions of men who are out of work and that our farmers are financially distressed as never before in our history. Deplorable as these conditions are in our country, they do not furnish any argument against the action taken by the President in granting a moratorium to Europe.

I take no stock in the argument that the President was influenced by international bankers in announcing his moratorium. The international bankers may or may not be more interested in the private debts owed by Europe to our citizens than they are in the obligations of foreign countries to our Government, but that President Hoover was influenced by such a situation as this foreign indebtedness to our country and citizens I can find no proof.

The moratorium ratification reported to the House by the Ways and Means Committee gives nothing to our foreign debtors except the privilege of paying at a later date with interest the payments due for one year which the moratorium covers.

Some have argued on the floor that our European debtors are ready to pay and would have paid if the President had not stated to them that they would not have to pay. There is no proof for this statement; it is all speculation.

If the President had not granted a moratorium at the time he did, and which, by the way, was not granted until he had received the approval of the majority of the Members of the House of Representatives and the Senate, no one can tell what might have happened in Europe, particularly in Germany.

No matter what some people may think, our country is deeply interested in the industrial situation in Europe and all the world. The world to-day is very small—much smaller than it used to be before science and invention had annihilated space and time.

The President was undoubtedly interested and deeply concerned about the industrial situation in Europe last June when he proposed a moratorium. Our country can not afford to have one more of the European nations become communistic, and I am satisfied that if Germany had joined with communistic Russia in an attack upon the so-called capitalistic economic régime, that all Europe would follow in her footsteps.

Not only our country, but the whole world is in a great economic and political crisis. It is not for the rank and file of the membership of the House of Representatives to decide when there is or is not an international crisis or a European crisis that requires action by the Chief Executive of our Nation.

I was not fully informed when I received the President's telegram as to the situation in Europe. I had no commission from my constituents to keep in touch with industrial Europe. The President of the United States has such a commission and he is so situated that he can keep in touch with Europe. He is our leader under the Constitution in foreign affairs, and upon his shoulders rest the responsibility of a proper conduct of our foreign relations.

This is no time for politics. While President Hoover may be a Republican, he is my President and the President of all of our people regardless of political affiliations.

If I had some doubts as to the wisdom of President Hoover's proposed European moratorium, I would still sustain him in his action giving the debtor nations of Europe one year's respite in liquidating our demands on them, for the reason that under our Constitution he, and not the Members of this body, is charged with the conduct of foreign affairs.

The House Committee on Banking and Currency has reported to this House a bill to aid the Federal land banks of our country, some twelve of them, which carries a provision giving to the officers of the Federal land banks the power, when in their judgment it is the best interest, to grant a moratorium to the borrowers of the Federal land banks. This action is along the same line of forbearance that the President has followed out in his dealings with our borrowers in Europe.

I think that the President did the right thing last June in view of our industrial situation, in view of the European industrial situation, and all the intimate relations between our country and the world when he announced to the world that the United States, the richest country in the world, was willing to grant a 1-year extension to its European debtors.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, I recognize there is an unwritten law circumscribing new Members with reference to speaking on the floor of this House, but I desire your indulgence for a few moments while I make some observations with reference to the allied debt moratorium.

I have heard with much interest, though with some misgiving, I must confess, the debates which have taken place on either side of this Chamber. I deplore the partisanship shown in such matters when we are facing an economic crisis as stupendous perhaps as ever faced America before. What I shall say will have no partisan import. It is not a time to play partisan politics.

On last June, when the President wired Members of Congress asking their stand upon the moratorium, I withheld any commitment, choosing to wait until the proposition was submitted to Congress in regular form, and after due deliberation and consideration act upon the matter as one of the chosen Representatives of the people.

It is apparent from what has been said and what has transpired with reference to allied debt settlements in this country for the past eight years, that certain forces have been trying to connect German reparations payments with allied debt payments. It is a fact that across the Atlantic the governments of Europe discuss allied debt settlements only in terms as it affects the payment of German reparations. I quote from the message of the French Government delivered in the Chamber of Deputies on June 26, 1931, in reply to President Hoover's message of an earlier date calling a postponement of allied debts.

In order to reply to the suggestion of President Hoover, the French Government is ready to ask the French chambers, of which the intervention is indispensable and the decision sovereign that France abstain, provisionally and for a delay of one year, from conserving any payment on the part of the Reich.

But, being given the nature of the engagements of the Young plan, freely accepted and quite subscribed to, the solemnity with which was recognized the definitive and unalterable character of the unconditional annuities by which the necessary permanence of the principle of reparations was expressed, the risk of shaking confidence in the value of signatures and of contracts, and thus of going against the end aimed at would be great, if, in the proposed suspension of payments, the unalterable annuity were treated like the conditional annuity.

It is quite apparent, therefore, that England, France, Italy, and Germany consider a postponement of allied debts interwoven with German reparation payments. In spite of the fact that gentlemen on the floor of this House, the Secretary of the Treasury, and even the President, advises that it in no way affects German reparations, we know their position is misrepresented, so far as the debtor nations are concerned. America has had nothing to do with the Versailles treaty. We renounced all conquest and have accepted nothing from Germany whatsoever, except the cost of the army of occupation following the war. We have repeatedly renounced recognition of German reparation payments and, regardless of what has been done across the sea, it has been the policy of our Government to insist upon payment of allied debts to the United States, regardless of any arrangements that may have been made relative to Germany's payment to the Allies.

But now in this year of economic turmoil in America, comes the present administration abandoning the position of its former chief and setting out on an uncharted sea of postponement moratorium and ultimate cancellation.

In order that we may have a foundation upon which to base a conclusion regarding not only allied debts but German reparation, it is necessary to include the payments adopted for Germany under the Young plan in 1928. These payments were to begin under date of September 1, 1929, and continue for a period of 59 years, as follows:

or $8,192,578,800.	34,422,600,000

German indemnity of 113,907,700,000 marks, $27,110,032,600.

Let us examine these payments for a moment. The payment for the year ending March 31, 1931, is 1,704,900,000 marks, and these payments gradually increase for 36 years. The payments until October 15, 1949, include within the annuities the service of the German 7 per cent 25-year external loan of 1924, which amounts to an average of 61,800,000 marks annually. This security, of course, is pledged to the international bankers in such a way that they are assured of payments regardless of what may happen to payments to our own Government.

The last 22 annuities show a sharp decline in amount as compared with the preceding 37. This is on account of two reasons: First, the private loans to Germany have been provided for in the first 37 annuities, and, second, the allied debt payments to America during the last 22 years are smaller, with a gradually decreasing amount annually, which shows conclusively that the international banks plan to get their private loans and the allied governments plan to get their reparation payments in order to retire their debts to America.

It has been said that this moratorium is for the benefit of the German people. Its purpose is to stabilize the economic structure of Germany in order to prevent collapse and chaos, which might lead this sturdy race of people into communism. Let us see if the events which have occurred on European shores, in which it is true, we have not officially participated, but to which we have been silent witnesses, are conducive to the stability of the German people and its economic program. The Dawes plan, adopted in 1924 at a conference at which the former Vice President was chairman, and the Young plan, adopted in 1928 at Geneva, at which Mr. Owen D. Young was chairman, in addition to the indemnity laid down by the Versailles treaty, has required of Germany as indemnity, conquest, and future payments the following:

Indemnity exacted of Germany by Allies in land, cash, and in kind

Total indemnity, $36,177,832,600.

It is to be noted that the Allies in the Versailles treaty required of Germany a land area greater than all of the United States east of the Mississippi River, including one-ninth of her land area in Europe and one-tenth of her population, together with the amount of payments in cash and in kind amounting to more than 21,000,000,000 marks. The payments for the years since the war are shown, together with the total expected of Germany for the next 59 years, making a total indemnity upon Germany of more than $36,000,000,000. If this moratorium was shown to be as a charitable act for the German people in order to stabilize their economic structure and personal morale, I for one would be ready to support it; but the contrary is true. When the Great War to end wars was closed we went to the peace conference with the noble idea that there were to be no indemnities invoked, no conquest exacted, but the guiding hand of representative government and democracy should govern the statesmen gathered around that conference table in settling the disputes which then existed upon the basis of fairness, equity, and justice.

But the very moment that England, France, Italy, and Japan got their statesmen together they insisted upon exacting the largest indemnity and conquest that has ever been known in the history of man, and while we sat silently and complacently looked on, two of America's greatest financial geniuses have aided and assisted in the division of spoils. Talk about wars to end wars—there can be no such application among nations, with the great burden of indemnity, impossible of payment, resting upon the shoulders of a disorganized, bankrupt, and defeated people. The Allies have not only not paid a single penny of their own revenue to us in the way of war debts, they have even tried to evade the payment to us of the actual moneys they have received from Germany in reparation payments, with the exception of England.

Let us see, then, how the division of spoils is to be made when these payments are collected from Germany. The following table tells the story:

Division of spoils of German reparations among Allies

	Receipts, 1929–1966	Receipts, 1966–1988	Total
France	$42,233,800,000	$17,279,200,000	$59,513,000,000
British Empire	15,495,500,000	5,662,400,000	21,157,900,000
Italy	9,060,500,000	7,888,300,000	16,948,800,000
Belgium	4,553,100,000	1,165,600,000	5,718,700,000
Rumania	906,100,000	923,400,000	1,829,500,000
Yugoslavia	3,345,000,000	497,900,000	3,842,900,000
Greece	284,700,000	213,400,000	498,100,000
Portugal	518,300,000	180,400,000	698,700,000
Japan	511,000,000		511,000,000
Poland	19,400,000		19,400,000
United States	2,557,700,000	612,000,000	3,169,700,000
Total	79,485,100,000	34,422,600,000	113,907,700,000

The above table does not show the amount already received to date but indicates the amount to be received by each nation at the end of 59 years, when all payments under the Young plan are made by Germany.

Reparation payments are divided into two classes. First, unconditional annuities which can not be postponed and conditional annuities which may be postponed. To show how much France is assisting in stabilizing Germany in the scheme of moratorium, let me quote again from the message of the French Government in its reply to Mr. Hoover:

> To suspend the payment by Germany of the unconditional annuity, while admitting that the Young plan placed with the public should continue to be served, would go directly against a fundamental principle. The (French) Government then considers that a moral interest of the first order is attached to this: That even during the delay provided for by President Hoover the payment of the unconditional annuity should not be altered in any way.

Therefore, it is clear that, in spite of the moratorium that may be granted France and the Allies on their debts to us, the French insist upon the payment of Germany's unconditional annuity of 673,000,000 marks. This sum, after being collected in taxes from the German people and placed in the International Bank of Settlements, is to be reloaned to the German Railway Co. The expressed provision in the moratorium divides the German payment for 1931 into 10 equal annual instalments of more than $40,000,000 each, plus interest at the rate of 3½ per cent, this amount to be added annually to Germany's future payments of more than $400,000,000, thereby making Germany's payment to the Allies next year $454,000,000. If Germany is unable to pay $400,000,000 in 1931, how can she be expected to pay $454,000,000 in 1932, in 1933, and so forth, down through the years?

Mr. Speaker, it is not only apparent but it is as clear as the radiance of the sun itself that Germany will never be able to meet these payments, and that our position now based upon the moratorium in reference to German reparation means continued postponement and ultimate cancellation. The President of the United States and the great Secretary of the Treasury can not escape such an implication.

Having established a basis for the consideration of allied debt payments, let us see what the settlement was in 1923, what the payments have been in the past eight years, and ascertain if we may, whether or not the allied nations have lived up to their obligations made to America when this Nation cast its lot in the greatest war of history and proposed to not only furnish materials and the sinews of war but the very lifeblood of the Nation itself. Their representatives sent to us on those patriotic occasions in 1917 promised payment in cash and in kind for every dollar which we loaned to them across the sea. Let us see how well they have met that obligation.

By referring to the table on debt settlement it will be noted that the total funded principal and interest was $11,565,093,885. The total payments that have been made to date on principal and interest amount to $2,627,580,897.72. Amount of principal paid amounts to only $443,310,743.87. I wish to call your attention to the interest rate paid by foreign governments on these loans. Greece pays the smallest rate of interest of 0.25 of 1 per cent; Italy pays 0.405 of 1 per cent; Yugoslavia 1.03 per cent; and France 1.64 per cent. The other nations' rate of interest range from 1.79 per cent to 3.327 per cent. While the interest rate on United States Government bonds have been from 3½ per cent to 4½ per cent, which the taxpayers in America have been paying during the past 13 years, the foreign governments are paying us a rate of interest far less than our own taxpayers contribute to our own Government.

France, who has gold reserves of $2,534,000,000, compared with the United States gold reserve of $3,903,000,000, seeks now to have her debt payments postponed for one year. France has the largest supply of gold in the world with the exception of the United States, and her supply grew from $1,660,000,000 in April, 1930, to $2,534,000,000 in October, 1931. America's gold supply was reduced from $4,632,000,000 in August, 1931, to $3,903,000,000 in October, 1931. Most of the reduction in gold reserves in the United States during the months of September and October this year went to France.

In other words, France withdrew in gold credits in the United States about $720,000,000 during September and October. The records show that France has to her credit in this country at the present time about $600,000,000. Can any Member of this House who represents a constituency of distressed people, with thousands of them unemployed and hundreds of them literally starving to death, conscientiously vote to renounce the payment of debts to this country when one of the debtors—France—has more than half a billion dollars on deposit in the banks of this country?

But Mr. Mellon tells us that the English treasury is in a deplorable condition. That the pound sterling is 47 per cent below par; that if England pays us at this time, it will take 47 per cent more sterling or goods in kind to satisfy the debt. Let me remind the gentleman that in America there are thousands of farmers and hundreds of thousands of home owners who now have their farms and homes plastered with mortgages, contracted at a time when prices and wages were high, and who are now being called upon to pay this indebtedness in cash and in kind with the bounty not at 47 per cent, as Mr. Mellon says the British must pay, but with a bounty of 75 per cent. I can not make consistent my position in voting for the moratorium. I would not represent the spirit of my constituents when I refuse to accept the debt from allied governments, and thereby add to the taxpayers' already heavy burden extra taxation to make up the deficit. There is already a deficit of a billion dollars in the Treasury of the United States, and it is generally predicted that another billion will be added during the next year. This deficit must be made up by the taxpayers of this country or by floating bonds which must ultimately be paid with interest.

[1] Payments of governments which have funded were made prior to the dates of the funding agreements. Unfunded indebtedness is exclusive of accrued and unpaid interest thereon.

[2] Accrued and unpaid interest on funded debts due to exercise of options to pay specified amounts over first 5 years in lieu of total amounts due, for which bonds similar to those originally issued under funding agreement will be given upon expiration of the options for the full amount deferred.

[3] Difference between principal of funded debt and amount here stated represents deferred payments provided for in the funding agreements, for which gold bonds of the respective debtor governments have been or will be delivered to the Treasury.

[4] Increase over amount funded due to exercise of options to pay one-half of interest due on original issue of bonds in bonds of debtor governments.

[5] Represents proceeds of liquidation of financial affairs of Russian Government in this country. (Copies of letter dated May 23, 1922, from the Secretary of State and reply of the Secretary of the Treasury dated June 2, 1922, in regard to loans to the Russian Government and liquidation of affairs of the latter in this country, appear in the Annual Report of the Secretary of the Treasury for the fiscal year 1922, as Exhibit 79, p. 283, and in the combined annual reports of the World War Foreign Debt Commission, Exhibit 2, p. 84.)

But gentlemen on both aisles of this Chamber say that they are willing to vote for the moratorium for one year, but propose to have the Congress go on record as opposed to the postponement or cancellation of debts. The difference between these gentlemen and my position is that I want to serve notice now instead of waiting until 1932.

In 1921 the Treasury Department drafted a bill and submitted it to Congress providing that—

The Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is authorized from time to time to refund or convert and to extend the time of payment of obligations of any foreign government.

Mr. Mellon appeared before the Senate Committee on Finance on June 29, 1921, and asked that this bill be passed. This is what he said:

It was considered desirable to be prepared for any contingency. You can imagine where a country may be weak in its resources, and that country may have, say, German bonds or bonds of some other country which may add to the security if those bonds can be accepted, and they naturally will be accepted, with the indorsement of the country having the primary obligation.

But the Congress rejected Mr. Mellon's proposal and inserted a clause which provided that nothing contained in the debt settlement could be construed to authorize exchange of bonds or cancel any part of such indebtedness. Back as far as 1921 the Secretary was looking forward to a time when he could adjust the payment of allied debts in any manner satisfactory to the international bankers, and there is no question in the minds of the Members of this House, both those for and against the moratorium, but what the international bankers constitute the most powerful force in favor of the moratorium.

But let us see how much we have given the European nations, how much we have loaned them, and how much foodstuff was placed to their credit since the beginning of the war up until the present time. I herewith insert a table showing private American loans to the various European governments at the close of 1930.

NOTE.—The portfolio and total investment figures contained in this table are subject throughout to adjustments made necessary by the international securities movement.

Amount of food and materials, cash, and loans of American Government to European nations from 1917 to 1931

Allied debts to the United States	$12,090,667,000
Discount from loan on debt settlement	5,875,000,000
Discount on interest charged on allied debt	5,687,000,000
Food and materials given Allies at close of war	2,675,000,000
Private loans to European governments	4,929,777,000
Total	31,257,444,000

Out of this tremendous sum we are to receive a little more than $17,000,000,000, making a net gift to the European nations of about $14,000,000,000. Can any European truthfully say that America has not been charitable to their people? Can any American say that we have not done our part by Europe? We have been playing Santa Claus for 14 years while our mills and mines and factories have closed, while 10,000,000 men walk the streets searching for employment, and while millions of farmers and home owners are having their property sold out from under their feet, the proposal is brought in here to continue to play the Santa Claus act for war-preparing nations in Europe. But the gentlemen tell us to vote for the moratorium now, and that next year we will serve notice on Europe that she must stand on her own responsibility and meet her obligations. I for one, am ready to announce, that so far as I am concerned, she must stand on her own responsibility and meet her obligations now. We are told, and it has not been denied on the floor of this House, that many of these nations already have on deposit in this country the credits to pay their debt. The amount is about $252,000,000. The argument has been made that unless we postpone the payment of this amount that the financial structure of Europe will crumble. If the financial structure of Europe is only $252,000,000 strong to-day she will crumble before another year, and we should accept the money now or else we may run the risk of losing it in the future, but, gentlemen, I do not believe that Europe is in that sad financial plight. If these nations, who are our largest debtors, can spend $1,500,000,000 on armaments, they are in no way near the brink of financial collapse and disaster.

America holds the key to the entire situation for forcing disarmament throughout the world. She holds the purse strings of the universe. If America, through a strong virile administrative leader, would say to Europe that when you disarm and curtail your military expenditures, we will be ready to talk postponement and moratorium, we absolutely would force not only peace in Europe but peace throughout the world, and save from the wreck of military preparedness sufficient funds to retire allied debts not in 62 years but in 25 years. The peace of the world is at stake and you can not divorce it from consideration in connection with allied debt settlements or the moratorium.

In spite of all the gifts and charity we have bestowed upon Europe, I for one would be willing to continue the process if through that channel we can force disarmament and bring peace and contentment to a distracted and demoralized civilization. I would be willing to vote for the moratorium if we were assured that a reduction in armaments for twice that amount would come from the leaders across the sea, but we have no such cherished hopes. The war clouds are gathering in the Far East. Just the other day it was stated in the press that France is seeking to assume world-power domination, that Britain has enjoyed unchallenged for three and a half centuries. Nobody can tell what a year may bring forth. We fought the last war to make the world safe for democracy, and America furnished 4,000,000 men, materials, and the money. Let the Chief Executive place our country in the position it ought to occupy in not only demanding but in forcing peace through the moratorium and I am ready to follow his leadership. In that enviable position I desire to see placed my beloved America.

Mr. FERNANDEZ. Mr. Speaker, there is a little logic to a world debt postponement plan, but it would be unreasonable to assume a debt cancellation of any debtor nation on her obligation to the United States. At what price would we assume a debt cancellation? At home here we have millions in want for food; millions in want for clothes; millions in want for fuel; yea, millions in want for the vital necessities of life; in face of a condition when overproduction in almost every line of endeavor is rampant and the supply is plenty. Unemployment, suffering, and misery, people without the price of the essentials of life; without the price of clothes and nutrition for their loved ones and children.

The mere fact that a debtor nation shall continue to meet her obligations to the United States may not in the least alter the social structure or economic living conditions that confront the amalgamation of the human race to-day. But it is food for thought and more strength for the old adage "Charity begins at home first." Perchance there are some 6,500,000 idle workers in the country to-day. We should be reluctant to encourage any shiftless abandon on the working habit of any individual, but at the same time we must admit that there are the needful ever mounting in numbers, only to contribute to another form of cataclysm—a flood of overproduction with resultant surplus of labor—a virtual standstill of some of our industries—a system that is replete with fear of speculating and establishing; some markets that are inactive and under the lash; all awaiting a timely criterion that will prove the salvation of the world from the tentacles of the present chaos.

It is human to err, for a war always proves to be an error on some nation or nations; but the height of temperance and divinity comes when the nation that was instrumental in the defeat of Germany and her allies comes forth in an apparent act of mercy to, saying the least, help stabilize the finances of that government. For, in the short period of one year a reparations' debt postponement could not possibly have any favorable reaction on industry in the German Republic, nor could a war debt postponement for one year have any noticeable resuscitating effects on industry in any of the other debtor nations of the world. So, diametrically speaking, in my view, this 1-year postponement plan would only help stabilize the financial structure of the Nation itself, and the world in general awaiting the reaction.

In my telegram to President Hoover on June 24, 1931, in answer to his message of the identical date appealing his postponement plan for one year of all intergovernmental debts, I indorsed the idea on the grounds that I thought there was merit to the principle of the world debt-postponement plan. I carried out my indorsement by voting for the 1-year postponement plan to Germany and debtor nations. It only means that their repayment will be mandatory, effective July 1, 1933, over a 10-year period with interest at the rate of 4 per cent.

And section 5 of the joint resolution authorizing the postponement of the amounts payable to the United States from foreign governments during the fiscal year of 1932 expressly declares it to be against the policy of Congress that any of the indebtedness of foreign countries to the United States should be in any manner canceled or reduced.

I can see no harm in the postponement by this country of the World War debts, but I am fearful of what might occur across the waters of the great expanse if this plan were not put into effect as contemplated.

Representing, as I do, part of the great city and port of New Orleans, of the State of Louisiana, I speak for a constituency that is vastly interested in world or foreign commerce. And I think I can reasonably fortify my action in the National Legislature in happy anticipation of some real benefit or accrual to the port of New Orleans.

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Mr. Speaker, the rush with which the moratorium is being put through is alarming. Many of the Members, and I am among the number, have not been able to obtain the facts with reference to the necessity of the moratorium, nor have we been given any valid reason why the measure should be "railroaded" through the Congress with all the dispatch and clockwork of the "Memphis Special," or some other high-powered, high-geared train.

We of the opposition are told by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. RAGON] that we have prejudged this question from the reports in the newspapers. What other evidence have we had to consider? Give us the facts, or give us an opportunity to obtain the facts, and I for one, and I believe I voice the sentiment of the opposition, will calmly, deliberately, and impartially consider every fact before coming to a decision.

Why, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. RAGON] is a member of the committee that reported this resolution, and while he accuses us of prejudging this question from newspaper reports, for some reason his committee has only furnished us with a partial report of the evidence introduced before the committee—and did not furnish us with that until after Congress convened this morning—and I challenge him to point out one single statement in that evidence, and I presume that it is the most favorable part of the evidence introduced, that justifies the passage of this resolution.

I am against legislating on newspaper reports, and for that reason I resent the high-handed methods that are being used here to-day to put this matter through without first giving every member of this body an opportunity to acquaint himself with the facts. I could hardly believe my ears when the Democratic leader announced this morning that the moratorium would be taken up and that the House would be held in session until its passage. Why the hurry?

The Senate has taken no action and will not, in all probability, until after the holidays. The only conclusion I can draw from the rush and hurry, and I think it a valid and reasonable conclusion, is that the proponents of this resolution are afraid for the Members of Congress to acquaint themselves with the facts before voting. This conclusion is a serious indictment against the leaders of the proponents of this resolution. I hope they can justify their action on some other ground, but until they do my indictment stands.

Mr. Speaker, my opinion is that if the Members of Congress were in possession of all the facts this measure would never pass. Oh, be not deceived! Because the facts will come out, and when they do the American people are going to have a vote on this matter and that vote, in my honest opinion, is going to increase the class of "has beens" and bring a lot of new men and women into this body whose hearts, minds, and souls are dedicated to the service of the American people. Oh, I am not accusing the advocates of this resolution with being out of sympathy with the American people, or with being, in any way, disloyal to the American people. I know that they are loyal Americans. What I am trying to say to them is this: That they are out of touch with the American people and that they had better get a little closer to the man on the street, the man on the farm, the man in the factory, the 7,000,000 men and women in this country who are out of employment.

You may say that this is pretty plain talk for a new Member. Probably it is. I think the time for plain talk has arrived and when I think it is time to indulge in plain talk, why I indulge in plain talk, and that's that.

Having taken my stand against the moratorium, I think that it is only fair that I should state my reasons. These reasons are based upon my limited knowledge of the question. God only knows how many more reasons I would have if I were in possession of all the facts.

My reasons are as follows:

First. There is no necessity for the moratorium.

As I understand the matter, Germany, under the Young plan, could ask for an extension of her debts upon a showing of inability to pay. Now, remember, Germany has never asked for an extension of her debts under the Young plan. Why? While we have never been put in possession of the facts with reference to this particular question the natural inference to be drawn from her failure to put in operation this provision in the Young plan, I think, is that she could not show an inability to pay.

Certainly if Germany was right up against it financially and was unable to pay, she would have taken advantage of the provision in the Young plan. That, as I understand this matter, expressly provides that upon a showing of inability to pay on the part of Germany she shall be entitled to an extension.

I would like to know, and the American people I am sure would like to know, why Germany, if in financial straits, did not take advantage of this provision in the Young plan.

I further call attention to the fact that the National City Bank of New York has handled $1,071,000,000 and joined other syndicates in handling $3,260,000,000 of German Government, German municipal, and German industrial bonds, and that default has not been made in the payment of a single bond handled by the National City Bank to date, and to the further fact that the drop in the price of foreign bonds has been less than the drop in domestic bonds. Why, Mr. Speaker, don't we know, and don't the American people know, that if Germany was one-half as bad off financially as the proponents of this measure would have us believe that default would have been made, long since, in the payment, to say the least, of some of these bonds? Why, this fact alone shows that the industries of Germany and, I might add, the German Government itself, are upon a reasonably sound financial footing.

Second. The German Government, as I understand, has never requested a moratorium.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it has been charged upon the floor, and never denied so far as I have heard, that Germany never requested the moratorium. Why? Well, I do not know, because I have no way of finding out, but I have drawn my own conclusion from the fact that no request for a moratorium has come from Germany. I give my conclusion to you for what it is worth. My conclusion is this: If Germany had requested a moratorium, the American people would have demanded, as a prerequisite to giving serious consideration to the request, that she first show an inability to pay. Germany could not show an inability to pay and, of course, had sense enough to know that such a request would be ridiculous, and therefore proceeded in a different way.

Third. Because I am afraid that a moratorium will lead eventually to cancellation.

If we pass Mr. Hoover's personal moratorium or, rather, the international banker's moratorium, we are giving the nations of Europe the opportunity to stop paying their debts, and if this is ever commenced it is going to be hard, to say the least, to get them to resume payments. We have already given away $5,000,000,000 of the people's money to the nations of Europe and in return the only thing we have received is their ill will and ridicule, and I believe that it is time we realized the fact that this money does not belong to us and that our relationship with respect to same is that of trustee for the people.

We did not start the trouble that necessitated our Government in making these loans anyway. The trouble was started by Germany, and if Germany has to pay and pay dearly for her folly, she has only herself to blame.

Fourth. Because, under the circumstances, the American Congress, representatives of the American people, can not justify a moratorium to Germany at this time.

As above stated Germany, if in financial straits, upon a showing of inability to pay could have put in operation the machinery provided for in the Young plan and obtained an extension of her debts. There is nothing in the Young plan, of course, which would have denied her the right to request a moratorium. She did neither for the obvious reason that a request for a moratorium would have to be predicated upon an inability to pay, and the machinery provided for in the Young plan could only be set in motion upon a showing of an inability to pay.

Then why forgive Germany her debt, not for a period of one year as we were first led to believe the President desired but a part of it for 10 years? The resolution provides for the debt to be paid "in 10 equal annuities, the first to be paid during the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1933, and one during each of the nine fiscal years following, each annuity to be payable in one or more installments."

O Mr. Speaker, we do not stop with forgiving Germany her debt to us for the period provided for in the resolution, but we are, it seems, so solicitous of her welfare that we demand as a prerequisite to our forgiveness that all nations creditors of Germany do likewise.

Can we, the Representatives of the American people, justify such a stand and at the same time deny the American farmer, small business man, laborer, and soldier boy relief? When we forgive Germany, or forbear with Germany, we are saddling the burden somewhere. Do not forget that. There is no use kidding ourselves. We had better face facts. We are taking the burden off the back of Germany and placing it upon the back of the American taxpayer. We are, by our action, directly adding additional burdens to the onerous burdens under which the people of America are groaning to-day. We are preferring the men, women, and children of Germany to the men, women, and children of America, and, in my opinion, doing it without being driven by necessity to take such a stand but without even invitation or request.

And what a burden we are placing upon the American people. We are denying them the present benefit of $252,000,000 and in all probability denying them the future benefits to be derived from our foreign debts, and this in these days of distress and want, when homes are being sold from over the heads of our own people, when the Federal farm banks are foreclosing mortgages on American farms, when 3,000 banks in this country, representing $2,000,000,000 liabilities, have closed; when 7,000,000 men, representing around 30,000,000 hungry mouths, are out of employment; and our own Government facing a deficit of around $2,000,000,000.

And we are doing it in spite of the fact that there is no necessity for our action, in spite of the fact that Germany could afford to spend last year on arms $171,923,040, and in spite of the fact that it has been openly charged on this floor, and never denied, that $800,000,000 of the money the Germans have borrowed from the American people have been loaned by the Germans to Soviet Russia at a higher rate of interest and for the purpose of diverting Russian trade to Germany.

O Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, this is not a resolution to relieve Germany, but a resolution to give the bank creditors of Germany in the United States a preference over the German obligations to our Government. We are, I am afraid, legislating to-day against our Government and in favor of the international bankers. I hope I am wrong, but with such facts as I have been able to dig up, I am driven to this conclusion. These bankers, it seems, are afraid if Germany pays us she will be unable to pay them. Well, be it ever understood that I am here legislating for the American people and not the international bankers.

Oh, we are told by the able gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. RAGON] that while he has misgivings about the moratorium, and about this, that, and the other, that: "But there is one thing in which I know I am not wrong, and that is in following the President." I know the gentleman is sincere in making the statement. He is an old college mate of mine, and I have the highest respect not only for his ability but for his sincerity. I want to remind my friend, however, that there are 72 new faces in this Congress by reason of the fact that 72 of the old Members entertained the same view of the President that he at this time seems to entertain, and that he would do well to profit by their sad experiences.

Stand by the President! The sentence sounds well and looks well in print. It has a tendency to convey the idea that the speaker is big and broadminded. Well, I can tell you in a few words where I stand regardless of whether it sounds good or looks good, and regardless of whether it conveys the idea that I am dwarfed and narrow-minded. As between the President and the American people I stand with the people. As between Germany and America, I stand under the Stars and Stripes.

Yes; I stand to-day where I have always stood—for the great masses, for the men and women in this country who are in distress and need a lawyer at court.

For the farmers of this country, who, if anyone needs a moratorium, need a moratorium against the debts owed by them to the Federal land banks. If we are going to declare any moratorium or cancel any debts, let us first give consideration to the claims of the farmers, small business men, and laborers of our country.

For the laboring men of this country, who are not asking for charity but are demanding work.

For the small business men in this country, who are finding it hard to make buckle and tongue meet during these days of Hoover prosperity.

For the soldier boys of this country, many of whom are being denied proper attention to-day because of lack of hospital facilities to take care of them.

Mr. Speaker, when we have considered and taken care of the claims of our own people, I am willing to think about the claims of others, but not until then.

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Speaker, after due deliberation I am compelled to cast my vote against this bill. I am opposed to legislation by telegram. The framers of the Constitution did not contemplate that international affairs, or even legislation of the slightest importance, could be carried on by correspondence or telegram. I wired the President in response to his message that I could not vote by telegram. I still adhere to that view.

Before presenting my reasons against the passage of this bill, permit me to make some observations upon the arguments adduced in the House to-day.

In the first place, the affirmative of this proposition would not win its case on the evidence presented to the House in a justice of the peace court in any township in the land. This has been charged on the floor and not denied. No case has been made in favor of the resolution.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] makes a statement that there is nothing else to do but ratify the President's conduct. He announces that he is opposed to cancellation of the war debts, and the bill itself, in an amendment, attempts to set up a policy against cancellation, which can, by the way, be changed by this or any succeeding Congress. The gentleman from New York says the President's conduct was unconstitutional and void, "But that there is nothing to do but ratify it." By the same token, let me ask him if he would vote for a cancellation of the debts if the President had unconstitutionally canceled them without consulting Congress?

The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. RAGON] says that banks will begin to totter if we don't pass this bill; and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] says that we are passing this "to save the world from chaos." Both of these are equally strong arguments for cancellation of the debts, and yet the gentlemen deny that they are for cancellation. If we are doing this thing to save our banking situation and to save the world from chaos, then they should be arguing for cancellation instead of a moratorium, both of which I oppose. For that matter, we have already had about 8,500 bank failures in the last 10 years, since the Harding policy of inflation of the currency was announced and put into effect.

Gentlemen on both sides of the Chamber say that chaos confronted us in June, and that chaos is just around the corner now unless we pass this bill. In my judgment if there was a confrontation of the country with chaos in June, the President should have called us into session if the imminence of saving the world was the point at issue.

The fact that he did not rather belies the proposition. Lots of things can happen between June and December, and I wonder, Mr. Speaker, whether these so-called collapses are voluntary or involuntary upon the part of the European nations who seek cancellation and moratoriums. Right after the war Germany announced she was collapsing, and we gave her the Dawes plan. In not many years she announced she was again sinking in the sea of insolvency, and we gave her the Young plan. And now, after a comparatively short time, we hear the cry of "chaos." They tell us that Hitler is about to get into power in Germany. Well, what of it? If he goes in, he will do so by an election, and the German people will vote for him. He is opposed to the bogey of communism. For one, I think it is none of our business whom Germany selects as her leaders. Again, I ask, are these collapses voluntary or involuntary?

The evidence before the committee shows that France and England, the other nations who owe the money to us—for we are not collecting a dime from Germany—did not request a moratorium and are ready and able to pay; it shows that the President requested the moratorium.

The answer of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] to a question on the floor is significant. When questioned as to what Germany would do with the money if payment is remitted, he answered, "She will use it for her own self-improvement."

Mr. Speaker, since the war we have remitted, canceled, or lost the enormous amount of $10,705,618,006.90 in war debts. Here is a table, an official one. I am inserting this table prepared by the Treasury Department showing (1) the countries with which settlements have been made, (2) the date of agreement, (3) the amount of debt funded, (4) interest to be received, (5) total amount to be received, (6) the amount that would have been received on a British basis (3–3½ per cent interest), (7) total amount that would have been received on a 4¼ per cent interest basis, (8) total amount canceled on a 4¼ per cent interest basis, and (9) total aggregate amount, being $10,705,618,006.90, canceled, lost, or remitted in all of the settlements:

[1] Settlement made on British basis.

Mr. Speaker, the United States has a population of 124,000,000 and $18,000,000,000 public debt, or $145 per capita. Great Britain has a population of 47,000,000 and a debt of $38,000,000,000, or $834 per capita. France has a population of 40,000,000 and a debt of $80,000,000,000, or $2,000 per capita. Germany has a population of 65,000,000 and a debt of $8,000,000,000, or $125 per capita.

Why, I beseech, gentlemen, can't Germany pay, in the face of these figures, if France and England can?

Mr. Speaker, this proposal breaks faith with the taxpayers of the United States. This moratorium simply means the removal of the burden from the nations of Europe to the backs of the American taxpayers. My reasons for opposing this moratorium are too many in number to announce in the short time allotted me.

It is not good business. We are nearly $2,000,000,000 in the red. Our Government has, or will soon have, a deficit of that amount, and this proposes to forego for 10 years the payment of one-fourth of the amount of our deficit. Is that good business?

One of the debtor nations is France—the most prosperous nation under the sun. In the last 10 years 1,500,000 farmers in the United States have lost their farms through foreclosure, and, in the face of that face, there is not a mortgage on a farm in France.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] stated on the floor, either substantially or in effect, that the debtor nations—not Germany but our actual debtors—would have had the money ready if the moratorium had not been proposed. Where, then, is there any collapse involved if they were ready, willing, and able to pay? If the restoration of confidence must be purchased with money, and if there is no other way to restore confidence in the world than to forgive our debtor nations, then we should not give them half a loaf, but cancel the debts entirely. This, I think, would be a mistake, but it is indirectly what the gentlemen are arguing for.

We can not say to the farmers and business men of this Nation that we have voted to give relief to Europe and deny them relief for their insolvent condition. These farmers and business men are entitled to our consideration, and this will be worse than Black Friday if we extend the hand of fellowship and plenty to Europe, and then deny the slightest aid to our folks at home.

Mr. Speaker, Europe is not in a condition to ask our aid. She has laid no foundation for mercy or charity. Listen to these appalling figures: During the year 1931, a year in which Germany staggered toward financial collapse, she spent $171,934,040 for armaments. Great Britain spent $465,255,000 and her dominions added $266,560,065. France, the richest nation in the world, spent $466,960,000 for armaments. Soviet Russia spent $578,942,707; and the United States, forced by their example to keep pace with increasing armament, spent $707,425,000. The total of the world's expenditures, the pace for which was set by Europe, is $4,157,931,958. This vast sum was spent during the last fiscal year. Compared with these enormous sums, the $400,000,000 lifted from Germany's shoulders by the moratorium is a bagatelle.

So I say, Mr. Speaker, until Europe has ceased her preparations for the next great war, until she has shown some signs of actually needing a moratorium and being in a moral position to accept our good graces financially, she is not prepared to ask or demand that we help her.

Mr. Speaker, this vast deficit of $2,000,000,000 has largely been brought about by our warlike preparations, which, as I say, we have been compelled to make on account of the belligerent preparations of Europe. So I say to you that it is not good morals or good business to grant this moratorium until after a conference of the nations has been had, in which they have agreed to cut down their armaments comparable to their so-called ability to pay. If they have a collapse imminent, that collapse is due to their deficits; their deficits, like ours, are due to their vast armament program. Mr. Speaker, the idea is preposterous and this is a double-cross of the people of the United States.

We claim to be the leaders of the world in art, in finance, in war, in statesmanship, and yet we do the thing proposed in this bill that puts us at the foot of the class so far as genuine statesmanship is concerned, so far as setting an example to Europe to cease their preparations for another great war is concerned. On the other hand, it is rather an encouragement, when we forego their debts to us and permit them to continue arming—I say it is an encouragement to them to increase their preparations for another holocaust of war.

Mr. Speaker, I ask to have inserted in the RECORD an article by Garet Garrett, entitled "Other People's Money," printed in the Saturday Evening Post recently, and an editorial in one of the leading daily newspapers entitled "Should Not Arms Pay Their Debts?" printed in the Christian Science Monitor August 22, 1931. These articles, respectively, show their prophecy of the European situation and show the arguments against the granting of this moratorium.

Mr. Speaker, until common decency among nations shall be established, or at least demanded by us, in ringing phrases comparable to those of another Woodrow Wilson, until Europe looks upon the moral side of war with due respect, we can not do this thing.

What shall the harvest be? Will it be a cessation or a continuation of preparations for the time when the Four Horsemen will ride forth over the lands of all nations? Will this uncertain, hesitating method stay the hand of war? Will we not rather be confronted, most likely in the near future, Mr. Speaker, with the marching of armies and the sailing of ships prepared by the money that we have forgiven these nations which have been belligerent for centuries? This time demands firmness and exactitude of purpose, not a wavering, impulsive policy between nations. The passage of this resolution is an open invitation to Europe to continue her warlike preparations, and all the dreams of the great Apostle of Peace and his disciples have been shattered. The philosophy of this resolution is indefensible. The time is ripe to say "No," to forbid further vacillation and reproach.

[From the Christian Science Monitor, August 22, 1931]

SHOULD NOT ARMS PAY THEIR DEBTS?

Taxpayers of every nation directly involved in World War debts and reparations will do well to ponder events that are making possible a linking of debt reduction and arms reduction. The report issued by the Wiggin committee at Basel is generally regarded as laying the groundwork for further discussion on debt rescaling. Reception of the moratorium for Germany, especially in the United States, encourages an expectation that public opinion would ratify debt revision as a means of speeding economic recovery throughout the world.

One factor in the situation that can not be overlooked is the attitude of governmental leaders in the United States toward arms reduction as a necessary feature in any scaling down of war debts. Mr. WILLIAM E. BORAH, chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, is one of many who are withholding judgment on proposals for debt revision until they see how things go at the Geneva disarmament conference next February.

This issue has outgrown chancelleries and sits on every doorstep. Statesmen who talk of debt reduction are asking taxpayers in creditor nations, chiefly the United States, to assume a burden that may amount to several billion dollars. The American Government, having borrowed from some of its people to lend abroad for war purposes, would tax most of its people to redeem its wartime bonds. This situation places the taxpayer in the position of ultimate creditor, even to his own Government.

One of the fundamental rights of a creditor is to know for what purpose any money he may advance is to be used. This is even more applicable when the disbursement becomes an outright donation, as it would be in the event of war-debt reduction. Here arms reduction enters the picture, for nations of the world expended $4,157,931,958 for armaments during the last fiscal year.

It was a year in which Germany staggered toward financial collapse. Yet Germany spent $171,934,040 for armaments—a small sum compared with outlays of others nations, but nearly one-half the amount saved to the Reich as a result of the moratorium. Great Britain, in recent weeks, facing a financial crisis, spent $465,255,000, and its Dominions added $266,560,065. France devoted $466,960,000 to armaments while still straining her resources to rehabilitate devasted war areas and insisting upon reparations to that end. Finally, Soviet Russia and the United States topped the list with expenditures of $578,942,707 and $707,425,000, respectively.

Compared with these enormous sums, the $400,000,000 lifted from Germany's shoulders for one year by the moratorium dwindles in significance. If the nations would agree at Geneva to reduce world expenditures on arms only 9½ per cent, they would thereby save enough to make an outright gift of $400,000,000 every year to the cause of world economic rehabilitation. What more logical than that proposed outlays for armaments be reduced to pay debts which have been incurred for former armaments?

Statesmen at Geneva can not fail to realize the force of this logic. While the movement for debt revision grows apace, the world still vacillates on the question of arms reduction. Certain elements advance the proverbial reactionary argument. "The time is not ripe." But when will it be riper? The whole world yearns for economic relief. Necessity has already compelled a moratorium that upset precedent and former policy. Necessity may compel debt reduction. Wise statesmanship, impelled by a world citizenry demanding sanity in world finance, can stop or reduce the mad policy of lavishing money on armaments while old debts for arms still keep world ledgers "in the red."

OTHER PEOPLE'S MONEY

By Garet Garrett

THE RESCUE OF GERMANY

Again, for the third time, Germany is threatening to sink in the sea of insolvency with all her creditors on board; and again it is the creditors who frantically work at the pumps. Their anxiety seems greater than Germany's own, and it is, for the singular reason that in this sea only creditors can drown. If Germany sinks, she will rise again, lightened by the loss of her creditors.

Twice the creditors, unable otherwise to keep her afloat, have cast overboard great parcels of debt, and that at first was easy to do because the debt was political. The name of it was reparations. But now, in this third crisis, there are two kinds of debt and two kinds of creditors on board, all in the same dilemma. There is what survives of the original reparations debt, and there is now, besides, an enormous private debt, owing not by the German Government to other governments but owing by the German Government, by all the German States, by German municipalities, by German banks, by German industry, to private lenders all over the world. This is new debt, created in the past six or seven years. The amount of it is more than $3,500,000,000. Two-thirds of it is owing to American banks, American investors, American lenders.

One value of this great private debt to Germany is that she can play it against the political debt. As she watches her creditors working at the pumps, she keeps saying: "Throw over the rest of the reparations debt. That is what is sinking us. Cast that away and the rest will float." Then, to her private creditors alone, she says: "Don't you see how you can save yourselves? Only side with us and we will get rid of the reparations debt entirely. We tell you the rest will float." This suggestion tends to divide the creditors, and they begin quarreling among themselves. But they can not be sure that if the reparations debt be jettisoned the rest will float. They are not sure of anything about Germany. So, in frustration, they appoint an international committee of experts to examine the ship from both the German point of view and that of the creditors, to reconcile them and to say what burden of debt the ship can afford to bear, Germany willing.

The first international committee of experts had to work in a diving bell. Germany then, in 1924, was totally submerged. By inflating her money until it was worthless she had committed an act of complete national insolvency, internal and external. Nothing like it had ever happened before. Nevertheless, the experts found the ship itself to be quite sound and so reported. All that was necessary was to float it again on a tide of confidence. Once afloat, it could bear a reparations debt burden of $625,000,000 a year.

That was the Dawes plan, and on the undertaking to make it work the German Government borrowed $200,000,000 gold from Great Britain, France and the United States to begin a policy of fulfillment. Then, immediately, Germany at large launched herself upon a career of borrowing so amazing and reckless as to correspond to nothing in the history of international finance, except, by contrast, her preceding career in bankruptcy by inflation. And this was the beginning of the private debt.

Five years later the Dawes plan was sinking the ship. The sum of $625,000,000 a year was a disastrous sum in itself; but what made it very much worse was that the Dawes plan did not say for how many years this burden should be carried. It had not fixed the total amount of reparations to be paid, only the annual payment on account. Unless the creditors would agree to fix a total, so that Germany might at least see the end of reparations, there was nothing for her to do but to embrace despair and sink again.

Then a second committee of international experts made an analysis of her resources and said she could afford to pay only $400,000,000 a year. That was the Young plan, and on the undertaking to make that plan work the German Government borrowed $300,000,000 from Great Britain, France, and the United States to launch itself upon a second policy of fulfillment.

But before the Young plan had even begun to work the former head of the German Reichsbank and other Germans were going up and down in the world proclaiming the authentic propaganda that reparations were bringing Germany to ruin; that unless she was relieved of that burden she would surely sink; that if a second act of national insolvency, such as preceded the Dawes plan, was the only way of escape, then this, with all its terrors, might come to seem the lesser German sacrifice. It is weird to remember that with this propaganda running higher and higher, still Germany could borrow on a scale hitherto unheard of.

THE "KAMERAD" CRY IN FINANCIAL CIRCLES

American investors went on buying German bonds, because the rate of interest was high; American banks went on putting their surplus funds on deposit in German banks for the same reason. They all said: "Oh, that is political propaganda about reparations. It has nothing to do with private finance or private investments." Nobody could imagine that the Germans would attack their own credit and really mean it, or that a second act of national bankruptcy was possible. It was a little like the warning on the sinking of the Lusitania. There it was, cold and authentic, but nobody believed it.

Suddenly, in June last, the lesser sacrifice did, nevertheless, become imminent. Germany was at the brink of national insolvency and calling on her creditors to forbear and save her from that disaster. Her inflated financial structure was about to fall. The Reichsbank was about to shut up. In that case, naturally, she could only default on the whole of her foreign debt, both political and private; and the private debt, owing not to governments but to foreign investors and foreign banks, had reached the prodigious total of more than three and a half billions of dollars. Could international finance afford to let such a thing happen? Were not Germany's creditors obliged in their own interest to come to her rescue?

The most sympathetic of Germany's creditors was Great Britain, not because she had more to lose than any other country—she had much less in jeopardy than the United States—but for other and complicated reasons. Almost every day in June the head of the Bank of England had New York on the telephone to tell American bankers how desperate the German situation was, how daily it grew worse, and why it behooved the United States to take great measures. Only the United States had the resources to save this Germany. England alone was helpless to avert the calamity. France was obscure. The United States was obliged, in its own selfish interest, to act. For suppose Germany failed, what would happen to American banks with enormous sums on deposit in German banks? And what would happen to the German bonds that had been sold to banks and private investors all over the United States? What would happen to American banks that had these German bonds among their reserves? When the head of the Bank of England was not calling New York the British Government itself was calling Washington and saying the same things.

THE INTERNATIONAL DEBT HOLIDAY

Such were the circumstances under which President Hoover proposed an international debt holiday. No reparations to be collected by the former Allies from Germany, no payments to be made by Europe on account of war debts to the United States

Treasury for a period of one year. The effect of this was a loan of $400,000,000 to Germany. That was the amount she would have had otherwise to pay away on account of reparations. And besides that effect, international finance at the same time made a direct loan of $100,000,000 to the German Reichsbank to meet an emergency. The money was provided by the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, the Bank of England, and the Bank of France. On this day's work international finance heaved a great sigh. Nothing less than the bankruptcy of Germany had been averted. For several days there was a wonderful rise in German bonds, in securities of all kinds, even in commodities, the whole world over.

What followed immediately was a headlong flight from the German mark. Private banks in England, France, Holland, Switzerland, and the United States that had been keeping money in German banks because the rate of interest was high took second thought—and on second thought they were more anxious than ever to call their deposits home; for, after all, a year was a short time and nobody knew what would happen at the end of the holiday. But that was not all. The Germans themselves were in flight from the mark. They had been stealing away from it quietly for a year or more; now they began to run. They took German marks to the Reichsbank and bought dollars in New York, pounds sterling in London, French francs in Paris.

A 12-MONTH MORATORIUM WITH A 10-DAY BENEFIT

This could be done through the mechanism of foreign exchange; and when they had exchanged their marks at the Reichsbank for dollars payable in New York, pounds sterling payable in London, and French francs payable in Paris, they had then only to wire to New York, to London and to Paris to keep their dollars, their pounds sterling and their francs on deposit. Germans who knew not how to convert German marks into foreign bank deposits through the mechanism of foreign exchange found simple ways to get rid of them. For example, they would go to the nearest border and tender the largest possible German-mark bill for a small railroad ticket, wanting not the little journey into a foreign country but the change in Dutch guilders or Swiss francs, for hoarding.

The Hoover debt-holiday plan took effect on June 30, and Germany, on that date, with $400,000,000 less to pay out and $100,000,000 new credit borrowed at the same time, was $500,000,000 to the good. Nevertheless, within 10 days Doctor Luther, head of the German Reichsbank, was going about Europe in an airplane, to Basle, to Paris, to London, saying Germany must have immediately the loan of $500,000,000 more. The whole benefit of the Hoover debt-holiday plan had been swallowed up in the flight from the German mark, and Germany's financial plight was much worse than before. The lesser German sacrifice—that is to say, the total bankruptcy of Germany—now was really imminent.

International finance was horrified. Where was the end of this? The Germans rushing their own money out of Germany, and Germany at the same time imploring her creditors to put more in, to save her and to save themselves!

"It is a sieve," said the French, "a perfect sieve. Moreover, it is very probably a trap. Does Germany think that by threatening to repudiate her debts she can oblige her creditors to go on putting more and more in, merely in order to get a fixed amount out?"

The French were in a very strong position—much stronger than the English. The Bank of England had been steadily losing gold for a long time and was greatly worried about it, whereas the Bank of France had the second largest gold fund in the world and was steadily increasing it.

FRANCE'S POSITION

The French knew very well that the idea of another great international loan to Germany would fail if they declined to support it. So they said, "Very well. We will consider taking part in another international loan to Germany, provided the Germans will behave as debtors should. Debtors ought not to be cultivating a military spirit toward their creditors. Therefore, let the Germans disband their steel helmets, which represent the old military spirit again. Let them stop spending their creditors' money for what they call pocket battleships, which are really very formidable sea weapons. Let them undo their bargain of union with Austria, which is contrary to the treaty of Versailles."

At this, Doctor Luther flew home to Berlin. He represented only the German Reichsbank, and nothing else of the German Government; he was, therefore, not competent to discuss political matters. On his return a song of bitterness burst in Germany. The war still! The French again! They would take advantage of Germany's desperate necessities to make humiliating political demands. Having ruined the Hoover plan by making difficulties about it until the grand effect was lost, now they would use their financial strength to chain Germany down.

The English, dreading more than any other nation a crash of the financial structure of Europe, spilled unction on these waters. They proposed a conference of prime ministers to be held in London, and persuaded the German Chancellor to come by way of Paris and stop there in his best German manner for such impression as it might make on the implacable French nature. The German Chancellor did, taking with him his foreign minister and a body of eminent experts. The French received them at the railway station under an arch of flowers. Anyone who even a little understands the French would know what that meant. It meant that the French were in a logical mood, and that when the embracings were over they would politely regret to find themselves astronomically removed from any point of view but their own. And so it was.

NOT GERMANY'S PROBLEM

Yet what the Germans were saying was enough to make the blood of international finance run cold. They were saying that Germany had no plan of her own to propose. She had only the facts to present. It was up to her creditors to regard the facts and then decide whether to save Germany in order to save themselves. The Germans said they were talking not only of their political debt—that is to say, reparations—on account of which they were obliged to find $400,000,000 a year; they were thinking even more of Germany's new private debt, amounting now to more than $3,500,000,000. This was money Germany and her nationals had borrowed during six years on their bonds and notes and short-dated I O U's from banks and from private investors in America, England, France, Holland, Switzerland, Scandinavia, and elsewhere, and more from Americans than from any of the others. A great deal of it—perhaps the half of it—had been what is called short-term credit—that is to say, loans for short periods, such as may be renewed again and again if the sky stays blue, and yet such as may be suddenly called away at the first sign of bad weather. It had been dangerous to borrow so much short-term credit. They said they knew that all the time. Much of this short-term credit had been unwisely spent. Some of its extravagantly. They knew that also. Admitted it as one of the facts.

Now, many of those who had been lending Germany this money were calling it back. But having spent it, how could Germany give it back, or, in any case, all at once? It was due and payable, yes. The creditors were within their rights to call it back. But they were calling to the vastly deep of 10,000 empty German tills. If they insisted, there was only one thing for Germany to do. That was to confess herself bankrupt and so treat all her creditors alike. It was not Germany's problem really. It was a problem for international finance to solve. The only way for the creditors to get interest or principal out of Germany, or reparations either, was to go on lending her money to pay them with.

At this point of the German discourse international finance began to shudder. For six years it had been pouring money into the German treasury, into German industry, into German banks, saying all the time, "If the world expects Germany to pay reparations it must lend her enormous sums to build up her internal economy." Now, Germany was saying to her creditors, "If you expect to be paid you must go on lending us the money to pay you with. To save your investments you must save Germany first."

And what is it Germany must be saved from? First and always from reparations.

But the Germans were not through. They went on to say that unless international finance came to Germany's rescue with an enormous new loan, it might expect, first, a total eclipse of German solvency toward the outside world. After that what? After that communism—a red Germany, for what that would mean to the peace and comfort of her neighbors. And suppose this does not happen. Suppose for her own sake she can avoid going red in a political sense. Nevertheless, if now it becomes necessary for Germany to save herself with no more benefit of credit, she will be obliged to go red in an economic sense. She knows how to save herself. She has only to forget her creditors, forget the rules of capital, forget the arrangement by means of which international finance is trying to support a high capital structure, and simply flood the markets of the world with unlimited quantities of cheap German goods.

So that was what the conference of prime ministers had to face in London. First, in the obvious aspect, a sinking Germany—sinking for want of an international loan to keep herself afloat. An international loan would be normally the business of international bankers on its merits. But international finance at this time was practically unconscious. Germany had created a situation quite beyond its resources, its experience, or its imagination. International finance is not a bank, not a gold hoard; it is a mechanism. It had been willing enough to take German bonds for $500,000,000 more—if the bonds could be sold. But where could any more German bonds be sold? The world was already full of them, all selling at a terrible discount, because so many holders were trying to get rid of them. International finance, in short, was out of ideas. Possibly the prime ministers, with all their heads together, could think of something. Anyhow, that was the only hope; that was what the conference was for.

The conference took place in London in the third week of July. The seven principal powers of the world were represented. Six of them were anxious creditors; the seventh was the astonishing debtor. The United States was represented by Mr. Stimson, Secretary of State, and by Mr. Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury.

Regard it. In weight and size and shape, it is the most august meeting of high statesmen since war time. Imagine the opening, the formal gestures, a speech by the British Premier saying now everyone must forget his own and think only of the whole, of what will be best to do for the good of the world, since only by unselfish international collaboration can they hope to solve the problem before them.

THE ASTONISHING DEBTOR

Suppose Germany shall speak next. Has she any plan of her own to propose? No. Germany is helpless. She has no plan. She submits the facts and leaves the solution to her creditors. All she can think of is that an international loan of $500,000,000 will keep her afloat. For how long?

That she can not say. For a while at least. It would mean a breathing space.

What has Germany to offer for such a loan?

Nothing. Germany is helpless. She has nothing left to offer.

But what security?

None except her promise to pay.

But her promises to pay already exceed her power of performance. Is not that the problem?

That, of course, is the very problem. The Germans admit it simply.

Will Germany be willing to secure such a loan by a lien on her customs receipts, as the French have suggested?

No.

Why not?

Because the German people will not submit to that humiliation. They will destroy any government that dares to propose it.

Will Germany make any political concessions to appease the French, such as to stop building battleships and to disband the troublesome steel helmets?

No.

Why not?

Again, because the German people will not suffer that humiliation. They would sooner go red. But perhaps Germany will agree to stop working for a revision of the treaties? Perhaps she will agree, when this crisis is over, to return to the Young plan and observe it faithfully, instead of trying meantime to get it revised?

Certainly not. Germany would tactfully remind her very distinguished collaborators that what they are dealing with is a financial crisis. It is a mistake, not to say a breach of concord, to load it with political difficulties.

Very well. But with nothing to yield, nothing to give, nothing to offer that has not already been twice exhausted, on what ground does Germany expect her creditors to lend her another $500,000,000?

The answer is ready. Germany would think her creditors could see the importance of doing it on the ground of their own interest. Suppose they refuse. Suppose they let Germany go. In the first place, the financial consequences will be uncontrollable. They can not be confined to Germany alone. Germany may have to sink, but her creditors will sink with her, and the effect may well be a world-wide financial crash. Secondly, that would be the end of responsible government in Germany. Suppose, then nationalism were to rise in its extreme form, or else communism. In any case, Germany would be obliged to save herself, even though to do so it were necessary to repudiate not only her debts but all other forms of economic restraint, cut wages, cut prices, and overwhelm the markets of the world with German goods.

GERMANY'S CHALLENGE TO THE WORLD

Helpless Germany! Able to challenge her creditors. Able to threaten the political structure of Europe. Able to threaten the economic structure of the world. How had she arrived at this oblique eminence? By intending her mind to it? By taking advantage of the stupidity of the world? By drift of forces that happen to be working for her? And was "threaten" the right word? No member of the London conference, gazing at the Germans, could answer even the last of these questions.

The English were deeply agitated at the thought of Germany going economically red, much more than at the thought of political Bolshevism. A royal commission had just produced a mighty treatise on the necessity to restore the world's price level. Its conclusion was that to stabilize prices at the fallen level would be a calamity. Prices, at whatever cost or risk, even if necessary by a process of scientific international inflation, must be stabilized on a higher level, or else a great deal of the world's capital, representing what formerly had been a normal expectation of profit, would be forever lost. Dumping, therefore—the thought or word of it—filled the British mind with dismay. Russian dumping was terror enough. A campaign of propaganda to bar Russian goods from English markets was at that moment running in the London press. But how much more formidable would Germany be in that red economic rôle, with her skill, her experience, her long ambition to dominate the foreign markets of the world, and her powerful industrial machine—the most powerful and efficient in Europe? And how politely the Germans were saying it!

Yet there was no misunderstanding what they meant; moreover, the idea was rising in Germany. The German newspapers were saying that an economic policy of self-saving, with no further benefit of international finance, would have the advantage to "loosen political and financial bonds which were not unconditionally necessary and have hitherto acted only as brakes on our development." And saying this at a time when the German Government held the German press in strict censorship.

The English could imagine those mountains of coal visible at the German pit heads breaking over Europe and running down into Italy, to the ruin of the British coal trade; they could see German manufactures underselling British goods everywhere in foreign markets. The British press touched the subject in a very guarded manner—hardly at all. But the London Times said it was understood that Mr. Ramsay Macdonald had taken the Germans aside and said to them that a policy of German dumping would bring them into conflict with England. He said England would retaliate, perhaps with no idea in his head of how really it could.

Well, the mighty seven-power conference of six anxious creditors and one astonishing debtor failed to find a magic chemistry. It labored and brought forth two suggestions, then adjourned, pronouncing its own benediction. The suggestions were these: First, that since a new international loan to Germany was not immediately feasible, each of the six creditor Governments should recommend to its bankers that they leave in Germany the remainder of their deposits instead of calling them home. Second, that a third committee of international experts be called up to study Germany's situation, analyze her necessities, and report. It sounds very little. From the creditors' point of view, it was less than nothing.

A TEUTON VICTORY

And yet Germany, with nothing to yield, nothing to give, nothing to offer, had won these three major points. The first point was that she got her loan, though it was involuntary on the part of the lenders. When the principal American and English banks, together with such others as could be bullied or persuaded, agreed to leave their overdue deposits and short-term credits in the German banks instead of calling them home, that was equivalent to a loan of much more than $500,000,000 to Germany. True, it was Hobson's choice. The lenders would have had to leave their money simply because they couldn't get it out.

If they had continued to call for their deposits, every bank in Germany would have been in shutters. Nevertheless, the effect in Germany was the same as if she had got a new loan. She had the money; she could continue to use it. It had been reloaned to her. Proof of the effect was that immediately normal banking processes were resumed throughout Germany, whereas during a fortnight before all German banks had been half moribund, under very strict decree from the government against paying out money, except in small sums and to people who had wages and taxes to meet. The great Darmstadter und National Bank, which had closed up tight a week before the London conference, was reopened at once. Just before it failed, its stock was quoted at 60; after the London conference a syndicate of German industrialists bought control of the stock at 125.

The second point was that Germany won a third international committee of experts to protect her from her creditors; and the American member of the committee was Albert H. Wiggin, head of the Chase National Bank in New York, who is publicly committed to the proposition that reparations and war debts should be heavily scaled down or canceled altogether, and that at the same time American tariffs should be reduced in order that Europe may sell more of its goods in American markets. In the last annual report of the Chase National Bank, he wrote:

"Cancellation or reduction of the interallied debts has been increasingly discussed throughout the world. This question has an importance far beyond the dollar magnitude of the debts involved. Without commenting on the many arguments on both sides of the controversy, and aside from the question of the justice of cancellation, I am firmly convinced it would be good business for our Government to initiate a reduction of these debts at this time."

Thirdly, what Germany most wanted was to lay a mourning wreath upside down on the Young plan, and that she did. The obsequies are deferred, but there is no German who does not take it for granted that the Young plan is dead, who does not believe it died sitting up in London. That is the conviction of Europe also, and the hope, besides, of a great body of Germany's private creditors who, trusting Germany to say that the rest of her debt will float, are anxious to see the last of the reparations debt go overboard.

Moreover, the Wiggin committee of international experts proceeded at once to dig a beautiful grave for the Young plan. Within four weeks it had made its report. It had succeeded, it said, in its first purpose, which was to induce the principal American, British, and other banks having short-term credits in Germany to extend them for six months.

But this, it said, was an emergency step only. Nobody could say what would happen at the end of six months, unless in the meantime the "governments of the world will realize the responsibility that rests upon them and will take prompt measures to reestablish confidence. Their action alone can restore it."

What measures? What action?

The committe skillfully avoided the mention of war debts. It spoke, instead, of the external obligations of Germany, and said: "So long as these obligations, both private and public, are such as to involve either a continuous increase in snowball fashion of the foreign debt of Germany, or alternatively a disproportion between her imports and exports on such a scale as to threaten the prosperity of other countries, the investor is unlikely to regard the situation as stable or permanent."

RUNNING ON BORROWED GAS

A certain conclusion was bound to follow. The governments that participated in the London conference and called up the Wiggin committee must, before the end of six months, assure the world that hereafter "the international payments to be made by Germany will not be such as to imperil the maintenance of her financial stability."

Certainly it is only governments that can do this. They can do it only by forgiving Germany her reparations debt and Europe her war debt to the United States Treasury. So now the voice for war-debt cancellation is the voice of Germany's private creditors, saying: "What difference does it make who pays for the war, so long as we are saved? Let America pay."

What this third international committee of experts represents is, perhaps, the last decline of a world delusion. The delusion is that there could ever be an economic approach to the problem of German reparations. How can there be, when the German Government itself officially speaks of reparations as tribute? People who believe reparations are tribute—and the Germans do deeply believe it—will not behave as if reparations were a debt. Yet that is how the world has been expecting the Germans to behave. Nor can there be any purely economic solutions with Germany, private or other, so long as Germans keep thinking, "This is the sixteenth—," or, "This is the seventeenth year of the war." Her principal creditors, remember, were her enemies in the war.

It is easy enough to make an economic analysis of the 1931 financial crisis in Germany. That can be done in one sentence. The great German machine, having been raised on borrowed capital to be the most powerful and the most efficient in Europe, was running on borrowed gas. Given that fact, anyone would know what the consequences were bound to be. But what is the fact worth? Why was the German machine running on borrowed gas? Why were the Germans putting their own gas out of Germany for safekeeping, in the banks of foreign countries, and borrowing gas—that is to say, short-term credit—from other people? Why?

When in early July the head of the German Reichsbank was going about Europe in an airplane soliciting an international loan of $500,000,000—gas—to keep the German machine from stalling, the Germans' own estimate of the amount of German money—their own gas—on deposit in New York, London, Paris, Amsterdam, and other foreign money centers was $1,000,000,000. There was so much German money on deposit in Paris alone that if it had been called for all in one day the French money market would have been demoralized. There was no danger of its being called for. The Germans did not want their own money; they wanted other people's money.

EASY MARKS

These you may state as economic facts bearing on the German crisis. They explain the crisis. Yet they are not themselves to be explained in economic terms. If the Germans had kept their own money at home there need not have been a financial crisis. They had enough of their own gas to keep their machine going. But they preferred to hoard their own in foreign countries. Seeing all this clearly, the French were unable to take a strictly financial view of the German crisis. They kept asking, "Why have the Germans brought this condition upon themselves?" Certainly not for economic reasons.

And remember that all this time the reparations debt has been not an economic burden, not a financial burden but a mental burden only. Actual burden it never was, for the simple reason that never yet has Germany paid any reparations. She has made the world pay them for her; she has made her creditors pay themselves.

In the beginning she had resort to the naïve expedient of printing paper marks and selling them all over the world so long as anybody would buy them. And people did buy them in prodigious quantities. The lower they fell the more they bought, saying all the time, "Germany will never repudiate her money; it is unimaginable," and thinking, therefore, it was a fine speculation to buy marks. The buyers of these marks, that were going to be repudiated, and the holders of German bonds receiving interest in those same marks—they paid the first reparations, not Germany. Germany took their money in exchange for her paper marks and handed it over to her creditors. When at last the cost of printing and shipping paper marks in bundles was more than the marks would bring, Germany stopped her printing presses, stopped paying reparations, and announced her total insolvency.

Then the French conceived the grim idea of collecting reparations by force. That was when they went into the Ruhr and seized the very heart of Germany's industrial machine. All they proved was that you can not collect reparations from an unwilling people by force. The Germans would not work their machine to produce tribute for the French. There were strikes and riots and, worse still, threats of wrecking the machine itself or jamming it by sabotage. Imagine it, when the slip of a monkey wrench in the hands of a sullen German workman might cost the French 1,000,000 francs of tribute. That was the French problem in the Ruhr, where they had the industrial organ of Germany in their hands. Suppose they had said: "Very well, we shall take the machine into our own hands and run it." But that would mean bringing workers and technicians from their own country. There would be no profit in that. Besides, if they did it, they would have a starving, idle German population on their hands. The Ruhr party cost the French more than they got out of it. No reparations that way.

At this impasse the nations of Europe joined to call on the United States, saying: "We are emotionally and politically mad. We have only sanity enough left among us to know that we are. We can not think economically. You over there have the vision of distance. Think of a way in which we may go on here in Europe. For unless you can, we shall go to pieces. Bring us a plan." We did. We sent American experts to straighten them out; we gave them the Dawes plan. Germany accepted it, crossed her heart for a policy of fulfillment, and borrowed $200,000,000 gold to get started with.

GERMANY'S SPENDING SPREE

Since the Dawes plan took effect—since 1924, that is to say—Germany's net payments on account of reparations, according to her own figures, have amounted to $2,350,000,000. In the same time, still according to her own statistics, she has borrowed from other countries the incredible sum of $3,750,000,000.

This is to say that since 1924 she has borrowed $1,400,000,000 more than she has paid out on account of reparations. Roughly, two-thirds of this borrowed money came from the United States. The next largest part of it came from Great Britain. The rest of it came from France, Holland, Switzerland, and other lending countries. More than three-quarters of the total came from her former enemies.

Simply to say that Germany borrowed with one hand and paid reparations with the other, or that out of every dollar she borrowed she paid 63 cents in reparations and kept 37 does not tell the whole story. The money had a circular movement. It went one way into Germany, stopped there for 90 days, 6 months, a year or more, to work, and then went out another way, like water turning a mill wheel. It is important to remember this, for it explains many otherwise incomprehensible effects. The money did not just go in and out again; it was detained and put to work. That is what people who talk economics mean when they say that with borrowed money Germany built up her internal economy in order to be able to pay reparations, and then paid them out of the increase of her wealth. She did build up her internal economy amazingly. She knew how to bend that stream of money on the wheel. And that is how it happens that she is to-day the second most powerful industrial nation in the world. The United States is first in the world. Germany is first in Europe.

She spent the borrowed money under three heads—namely, one, for housing of all kinds; two, on her industrial machine, to rebuild it, rationalize it, increase its power; and three, for public works, such as parks, baths, civic and recreation centers, stadiums, exposition buildings, new city halls, new post offices, roads, even monuments. A passion to build possessed them. Under the head of housing they completed in one year, 1929, new dwellings to the number of 330,000; and in 1928 the number was 310,000. The great weight of new housing was for wage workers, state servants, and people of moderate means. Any new housing project in the mass principle is called a settlement. So, workers' settlements, railway employees' settlements, post-office employees' settlements, bachelors' settlements. But settlements also in selected places for the well-to-do. What we should call real-estate developments on a very large scale. The aggregate is prodigious. The only way to see it really is from the air, because one settlement or one series of flat dwellings may be the size of a town. Moreover, you would have to drive an endless distance to see it from the ground. It is in character extensive and in new places. The cities have not been rebuilt. They have not changed so much. These people do not tear down old things to build new ones. For new things new ground. So all this change is in the environs.

The building passion overflowed necessity, became extravagant, experimental, sportive. New time, new materials, new shapes, new measures, new intentions. Churches all of steel and glass. The modernistic extreme in villas, morgues, hotels, schools, skyscrapers, commercial buildings. It was an architects' festival.

Many creditors are scandalized by the signs of Germany's extravagance with borrowed money; the French and the English more than Americans, since they have less understanding of extravagance in principle. The Germans admit it. They may say truthfully that they have been heard to denounce it themselves to one another. All the same, they went on with it. And then, too, great sums were purposefully spent for the future, as for a new fourth bridge across the Rhine at Cologne, now one of the engineering marvels of Europe.

FIXED ASSETS

The French said, "There is no present necessity for this bridge. Why do you build it? You do not pay reparations with a bridge." The Germans said, "We shall sometime need it, and we build it now to keep our people employed."

It was their instinct, or their wisdom, to increase their power and improve their conditions by any means possible, even though it was with creditors' money they did it. And from their own point of view they were right. What they have built they will continue to possess. Gold they may lose; credit they may lose. But machines, factories, power plants, bridges, public buildings, roads, laboratories, better dwellings, parks—these things remain. They can not fly away. What happens to the money seems relatively unimportant. Money is not things. It is merely the token of things. Destroy the token and there are the things still, physically untouched by a financial crisis. You can invent new token to represent them. That has happened before. Less than 10 years ago was not German money wholly destroyed? The things it had represented, they were not destroyed, not even German credit, which was an intangible thing. A new money token was invented in place of the one that had been destroyed, and lo! Germany was in good credit again, the whole world anxious to become her creditor.

Moreover, by what may seem to have been a reckless and extravagant use of borrowed money, Germany has created a great body of social wealth, visible as fine housing, recreational facilities, and other means to human well-being, the existence of which tends to defeat what impulse there may be to communism. If there was any real danger of communism in Germany, which is doubtful, it is greatly lessened by the fact that the German wage workers have much more comfort, well-being, and freedom of ego to defend than ever before.

WAVING THE RED FLAG

The red menace in all political senses is probably seven-tenths conjuration. The Communists are 4,000,000 or 5,000,000 altogether, but they have no leadership. There is not one important mind among them. There is an idea in Germany that the rulers of Soviet Russia do not want Germany to go red—at least not yet. They are too fearful of the effect it might have on her efficiency and productive power and too anxious for the present to draw upon that efficiency and power for their own needs. Whether this is true or not, the Russians would be very intelligent to take that view and to maintain in Germany merely a tin façade of communism, numerically strong, politically weak.

The well-poised German's view of communism is, first of all, cynical. He says, "It is something to have in the hand." He means that when the German Government is having difficulties with the Reichstag it can rally supporters by waving the red menace or threatening to take support from the Communists; and that when German statesmen are dealing with the outside world, as at the London conference, they can say: "Responsible government has its back to the wall in Germany. Uphold us for your own sake as much as for ours, for if this government falls, we shall all of us have to face communism in Germany." And it works. It has been working ever since the armistice.

None but a German can understand the involutions of German politics, and there is reason to doubt that a German does. Parties beginning at the center and shading right and left, parties within parties, parties left of the right, and parties right of the left, all in a ceaseless way of quarreling not about ideas as such but about the philosophy and theory of ideas. Any new idea has first to be examined from the point of view of party advantage and then, if ever, on its own merits. As you look at this ill-natured monotonous eddy of grumbling disagreement, their whole political mindedness apparently revolving in turgid innocence of the realities, you will say it is hopeless, worse than drifting. How can there be a sense of direction among them? But then when you look at what lies behind them in the last 10 years and at what they have done with their advantages against the world, you can almost imagine that a Machiavellian intelligence has been guiding them. Look again at the great eddy of political confusion, and it may occur to you that here their disagreements cancel one another and all their passion for petty interference is absorbed, so that beyond it in the field of reality their true intelligence, their racial intuition, or whatever it is that leads them, is all the more free to act upon their destiny.

For example, during the July crisis they passed from a republican form of government to a dictatorship and were hardly aware of it. The constitution was suspended in fact; they were governed by decree; their parliament was in a state of self-abnegation; employers were ordered to withhold 50 per cent of wages; scores of newspapers were shut up; a German could not cross the border without paying first a fine of $25; free comment touching the German Chancellor's work at London was verboten lest it interfere with the result—and there was no protest. Under the circumstances a dictatorship was necessary. It could set itself up automatically. No party was responsible for it; therefore no party cared. And the interminable sounds issuing from the eddy were the same as before.

IS THE RED MENACE REALLY RED?

And if Germany did go red in a political sense, it would not be like Russian communism. The Germans have not the heart to destroy their own things. They overthrew a monarchy and destroyed nothing. It never occurred to them to destroy its human symbol, namely, the Kaiser. He was exiled on a pension partly to appease the world; he was unwept, because he had failed. But the Crown Prince was received back and now is active in German politics at the extreme right. Least of all would the Germans destroy their tools—that is to say, their own industrial power—for that is their ground of hope.

Yet notwithstanding the reduction of the red menace, if it was real, and notwithstanding the social improvement in Germany, which is very real, many creditors are still scandalized. They keep saying: "From the German point of view, yes; but it was borrowed money. They spent it for such things as even the lenders can not always afford. They must have known, as they were spending it, that they would be unable to pay it back when it was due."

That is not exactly what they knew. They probably thought very little about it; and, moreover, if they had thought about it, they would not have cared. To understand this it will be necessary to go further with the German point of view. To begin with, most of the money was coming from American lenders, and every German has it in his heart that his country was beaten by America, not by the Allies. But for the vast weight of American resources, first as they were loaned to the Allies and then as they went directly into the war, German victory had been inevitable, according to destiny. American money thwarted that destiny.

Then consider the emotional conviction under which now every process of the German mind takes place. How it was arrived at does not matter as a practical fact. The conviction is that there was a conspiracy to crush Germany. It did not succeed. Yet there will be no justice in the world until the treaty of Versailles is destroyed; and the special infamy of that document is that it contains a confession of guilt extorted from a people reduced to their knees by the power of the whole world.

It follows that they have no sense of debt on account of reparations. Simply, reparations are tribute. It follows also that the secret German language about Germany's principal creditors may be extremely ironical, with some special emphasis toward Americans, from whom it was so easy to borrow money to pay tribute with. How could they be expected to care very much about what happened to the money they borrowed? It was the money of their enemies, and as they were borrowing and spending it to increase their power, they were counting the years the war had lasted—14, 15, 16. And what a stupid world of lenders.

The finality of all fact about the Germans is that they have the feelings, the mentality, and the motives of an injured race. Their sense of injury is obsessional, so deep and so ugly as to seem a national psychosis, as it probably is. Germany against the world is the one thought that will unite them; and that never fails. Self-commiseration is their emotional habit.

THEY THINK THEY ARE POOR

They believe it themselves when they tell you Germany is poor. You must not be deceived by appearances. There is bitter distress just beneath the surface. There is no fat, or, if there is, then it is not good fat. Germany's tissues are white, if you could only see them. Reparations do that. She is helpless; she is at the mercy of her creditors. Her middle class has been destroyed. Can you destroy a middle class without suffering? People come to look. They see Germans eating and bathing and trying to be gay, but this is desperation, the behavior of a people living in fear of deluge. Really it is not so. They are not gay. If the shops are busy, that is because the people are afraid of their own money and spend it in order to hoard things instead. They remember inflation. And if they go out to dine once more in a good way it is because they do not know what will happen to-morrow.

One who had heard this theme too much and was hearing it again from a group of tense, earnest Germans at dinner in Berlin last July tried turning their minds around.

"I imagine myself to be a German," he said. "The year is 1924. I am gazing at the heavens. Do you remember that after the armistice, or, as other people say, after the war, there came a craze for heaven gazing in Germany? That is when you began to build these wonderful planetariums."

"Yes," they said a little bewildered.

SIX YEARS' ACCOMPLISHMENT

"I imagine I was a German in 1924," he continued, "at a planetarium, as everyone else was, and as I sat gazing at the celestial mechanism suddenly I saw the future of Germany clearly, like a dream."

"What was it?" they asked. "What did you see?"

"Wait," he said. "First, do you remember what it was like in 1924? The enemy tarried in the Rhineland, holding it for hostage of good behavior. The French were in the Ruhr, squeezing the heart of Germany. Foreign commissions were seated in Berlin, watching and minding everything, pulling her teeth, and filing her claws. Germany was insolvent. Her money was worthless. A million marks would hardly buy a cold supper."

THE GERMANS GROANED

"Then the vision," he said. "I imagine that as a German I saw what would happen to Germany in the next six years. I saw that in 1930 she would be free of foreign control—the enemy would be out of the Rhineland, the French would be out of the Ruhr. I saw that in 1930 Germany would be the best-equipped nation in Europe, paramount in Europe for industrial power and second in the world only to the United States. I saw that in 1930 she would be the best-housed nation in Europe if not in the world. I saw that in 1930 her exports would pass Great Britain's for the first time, and this had been her lifelong ambition. I saw that in 1930 she would hold the blue ribbon of the sea against England with the two newest and fastest ships on the Atlantic, and that she would have once more a great merchant marine, all new and modern, besides building ships for other nations in successful competition with England's shipbuilding industry. I saw that in 1930 she would be first in aviation among European nations, with the largest landplane in the world, the largest seaplane in the world, the finest airports. I saw that in 1931 she would be strong enough to say no to the French when, as a condition for an international loan, they proposed that Germany disband her weaponless army of steel helmets and stop building battleships. I saw one of the new 10,000-ton battleships and reflected on the folly of Germany's enemies. They thought to limit the strength of her sea weapons with a piece of writing, which says a German warship shall not exceed 10,000 tons. All they did was to stimulate German inventiveness, for under this limitation she had made a sea weapon in 10,000 tons that was probably equal to any 25,000-ton warship in the world. I saw that in 1931 she would be strong enough to dare say officially, 'Reparations are tribute,' which was notice that she was almost strong enough to repudiate them. And I saw that meanwhile during six years she had borrowed much more from her enemies than she had paid them as reparations, which meant that she herself had paid no reparations at all. I saw that in 1931 she would be strong enough, without weapons, to threaten the political peace of Europe and strong enough to threaten the economic rhythm of the world by letting loose the full power of her industries and laboratories. There the vision ended. I imagined I had been asleep. It was a dream. What a fabulous dream! And yet all of it has come true.

LET THE CREDITORS WORRY

"It has come true," said the Germans, with not the slightest rift in their gloom. It was deeper than ever. "Such things as you mention are true," they said. "But you are not a German. You can not imagine what it is like. The situation of Germany is desperate."

What were they thinking of then? Their lost colonies? The French Empire? The new French fortifications? Their isolation? The guilt phrase in the Versailles treaty?

You will never know. It may be they were thinking only of how awkward it was for the stream of American money out of which they had been paying reparations to dry up suddenly. Unless it rises again, they may have to decide whether actually to pay something by way of tribute or repudiate reparations before they are quite ready to risk it.

Still there is the international debt holiday as an American idea for the saving of Germany. She will have nothing to pay until that ends; and it may be that her trapped creditors will yet rescue her from reparations. The world-wide depression is no worse in Germany than elsewhere. German agriculture this year is excellent and times are good.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Speaker, ladies, and gentlemen, I have listened to much argument on both sides of this question. On both sides distinguished gentlemen, longer in service, abler than myself to decide this matter from the standpoint of government and economics, have spoken for and against this moratorium.

The President also wired me asking my opinion and whether or not I would support the measure. Whether he had passed his word at the time and merely wanted to know whether by my vote I would support him I do not know. He did not give me all the facts in the case I am sure. He could not do so in a short telegram. I wanted to support my President if possible in all laudable undertakings that would inure to the benefit of the Nation.

I know that we were in the midst of trying times. I know that the time demanded heroic measures. The farmers in my district were receiving for domestic home-grown wheat less than 50 cents a bushel. Corn was relatively low. He was being crowded on his mortgages. Thousands of people in the towns were unemployed. Taxes were delinquent. I could not shut my eyes to these things, even though the papers carried each day items called "Bright Spots in Business." The very fact that the "bright spots" were so noticeable that they required front-page comment only served to make the depression more recognizable.

I knew from information received from the Federal Farm Board that at that time the price for German domestic wheat at Hamburg was $1.67 per bushel and for domestic French wheat at Paris $1.90 per bushel; that at Prague domestic wheat was selling at $1.24 per bushel. I therefore wired the President that I was no more in favor of giving a dole to these foreign nations than I was to giving a dole at home to our own citizens, but that if I were convinced that it would give our citizens relief, when all the facts were laid before me, that I would support it.

I have now listened to those facts as presented by both the proponents and the opponents of the measure, and I must decide from those facts.

The facts as I see them are: That while this moratorium is, and has been, to all intents and purposes, in effect since last June, by the President's act, the conditions in the United States have not improved but have in fact grown worse. Seven million men are still unemployed. Mortgages are being foreclosed every day. Farm produce is still selling below the actual cost of production. Taxes are the highest in the history of the Nation, and more taxes delinquent than at any time since the reconstruction days immediately following the Civil War. The people of the Nation have been starving for two years. Almost equal in number to the "Bright Spots in Business" in the newspapers are the items covering those people who prefer death to poverty. The people of this Nation have endured a long monotony of political, governmental, and physical pain. Now you would ask them, by this moratorium, to increase that pain, to take on a further burden, not to protect themselves, not to improve their condition, but to aid Europe.

Each day, by word of mouth and by letter, the cry comes to me that taxes must be reduced. Yet, by this moratorium, we would place an additional tax of more than $2 on every man, woman, and child in the United States. And not for their benefit—not for the benefit of our citizens—but for the use and benefit of Europe; to increase the armed forces of Europe; to increase the armed forces of France—the nation that has the largest per capita gold reserve in the world—a greater per capita gold reserve than our own. France spent last year, according to our War Department, $280,842,884 for its army, $278,079,290 for its navy, $96,828,072 for its air force, a total expenditure for armament of $649,941,747.

The minority report on the bill submits the fact that three nations to whom we are to give a moratorium, the British Empire, France, and Italy, spent on arms an aggregate of $1,424,637,565, while the total amount of which these three nations are being relieved by the suggested moratorium is only $224,227,125 on their indebtedness to us. Who is paying the bill for Europe's armament for future wars?

We are calling a conference at Geneva next year for the reduction of armaments. Many people in this Nation are interested in that conference. They want peace. The people of this Nation all want peace. They want to disarm as an aid to peace. Are not we a bit inconsistent when with our words we suggest arms reductions and at the same time, with a tax levied on our people, relieve these foreign nations of the indebtedness, so that they can devote more money to armament? Let us be consistent for the first time in the past 10 years. Let our actions for once fit our words. We have been promising aid to the farmer and the laborer and we have by our actions aided only the international banker. Let us forget about the international banker for one time and aid the people.

This moratorium means a tax on the Eleventh Congressional District of Indiana, based on its 1930 population of 193,671, of more than $400,000. The farmers, professional men, business men, and laborers of that district will have to pay that tax. Every resident of that district will feel the effect of that tax bill. If they must be taxed to give some one a moratorium, let us give it to these people themselves.

A great American international banker, who admits that billions of dollars of bonds have been floated in this country and sold to the citizens of this country by the international bankers, says that the youth of Europe will not pay these war debts made by a war of their elders, that they will rebel. By the same token, the President of these United States and the Congress of these United States should not endeavor to force upon the youth of this country a debt of Europe that the youth of Europe rebels at paying. This is a debt that no one in the United States contracted. Certainly, the millions of citizens who have reached adult age since the war did not contract this debt of the European countries.

There is but one thing to say regarding the assistance that this moratorium will give Germany. Germany does not owe us one cent of reparations. She only owes us for a small percentage of the cost of maintaining the army of occupation in Germany after the war. The payment due us from Germany this year is only $6,000,000. This is a mere pittance in international finances—less than the cost of a small office building in any big city in Germany or this country. And on December 11, 1931, it was reported in the newspapers that on December 10 Herman Dietrich, Finance Minister of Germany, told the Reichstag budget committee "that hope that the Hoover moratorium would place Germany's finances on a safe basis would be unfilled," and that Germany was "worse off than at the beginning of the moratorium."

The Finance Minister of Germany should know better than all others the condition of his country. He should know best of all how much his nation will profit by our President's moratorium. He says not only will it not benefit Germany but that his nation "is worse off" than at its beginning. I am willing to take the word of Mr. Herman Dietrich on this matter, he being in the best position to know.

There is a town within 25 miles of my home with a population of 32,000, and only one bank. All the others have failed in the past year. The treasurer of the county in which this town is located was forced to take his money to my home town to deposit when he collected taxes, because there was not any place in his county where he could deposit it. Thousands of banks in the Nation have failed. In every bank failure in Indiana the farmers and other citizens who were depositors have suffered a loss. The State of Indiana had more than its just share of such failures. We have had almost enough bank failures in Indiana to make a panic there. Maybe a moratorium would have saved some of these smaller banks that were engaged in trying to help our citizens instead of floating worthless foreign government bonds. They failed to get a moratorium.

I see no reason why we should discriminate in favor of France, Britain, and Italy against our own.

Give a respite to our landowners, give a respite to agriculture, give work that will bring food to the unemployed, protect our small merchant who is fast perishing, assist our manufacturers to begin again to use their machinery—when we have done these things, I shall be willing to give charity abroad—if that charity is not assistance to increase armaments. Until these things are done, I can not conscientiously vote for a moratorium.

Mr. SHOTT. Mr. Speaker, I was one of those who responded promptly to the inquiry of President Hoover and promised to support his plan for a moratorium for one year on intergovernmental debts. I thought then, and now believe, that it was the most heartening movement since the beginning of the world-wide depression. It matters little what the causes of this depression are, the fact that the business of our own country was stagnated and our citizens were rapidly going to ruin by reason of the locked lines of trade and industry was enough to make me give welcome to any real effort to stay the force of the economic tragedy and to revive courage and restore confidence.

There was so much that was wrong with the world, and those who were looked to as sound business men, farsighted financiers, great industrialists, and eminent economists seemed to be wallowing in a slough of despond, and the sum total of their contribution to recovery was mere wishes and expressions, such as: "We have these things at intervals; this depression will soon be over; revival is just around the corner; such visitations always have ended and this one will." The so-called experts were waiting and muddling as things grew worse, knowing it to be a bad situation, but not doing anything about it, except criticise Congress and abuse the President. When President Hoover undertook to go to the rescue, to do something about it, asked Members of Congress to aid him, I hailed with joy his effort and the opportunity it offered me to be useful to my constituents.

I have always felt that any kind of a mortal can become bewildered and agonized and shed tears, but the man who, when a thing is bad, tries to do something about it—tries to correct it—even though he fail, is a more dependable leader than one who does not try. The moratorium plan has already done more good than anything so far attempted. It encouraged the man in the ditch and the man behind the bank grill; it stirred the hopeless to renewed effort; it built confidence. Without the program of President Hoover business would have been so deep in fear and so far in distress that bankruptcies and suicides of distracted business men would have been multiplied instead of decreased. By the encouragement that an effort to do something gave, banks have gained a surer toe hold, broken ones reopened, failures decreased, and accommodations given to business men and enterprises that will save them for the usefulness that they are capable of when times become normal. The moratorium plan has justified itself in the increased confidence of the people and the increase in all lines of business and enterprise.

The economic plight of the world's nations, nearly all of which are unable to pay—in fact, are in the same situation as millions of our citizens who can not curtail their notes, pay their mortgages, or keep up their interest—has become the concern of the United States. There was a time when foreign conditions would not have affected us. It did not matter to us if they were in financial straits. We had reliance that did not fail in our own resources, our own markets, which made the country prosperous, furnished employment and the opportunity for accumulation by all classes. Our rapid increase in wealth caused the big-eyed and the greedy among our great financiers to seek other worlds to conquer. The peculiar system that made the control of the Nation's wealth possible was unsound from inception, and if it had not been that greed overwhelmed judgment and a few believed that they could suck the blood of the herd and not themselves suffer, such a system would not have been embraced at all. With the chain stores and the chain utilities a pipe line was built from the rural sections and small towns to the great money centers, and the lifeblood of the small communities was siphoned away to the reservoir from which foreign borrowers helped themselves with more ease than small-town banks and business could find help in time of need. Governments and minor civil divisions, municipalities, and the like have issued bonds, it is charged, on the suggestion of agents of the great financial groups of this country, and these groups have flooded the country with them. Many banks were persuaded that they should liquefy their assets by replacing farm and home mortages, which were slow, with foreign bonds, which are only fancy printed promises to pay and are not as good assets as the moral risks to be found among the customers in any of the towns and rural communities of America. When the "idea" of the investment bankers was spread that real-estate security was "old stuff," rural United States was prostrated and the security of the Republic was weakened, for home and farm ownership is this Government's bedrock of safety.

At first the withdrawals by the chain system and the sale of foreign bonds had little effect, and we could have stood one, but not both. The growth of these practices and the shrinkage in values they compelled finally and fatally depleted the agencies of local prosperity. The accumulations of all, from the poor man with only a second shirt to the plutocrat, shriveled and shrunk. There was agonizing and groaning and bewilderment. Then President Hoover called Members of Congress, and made the suggestion that the moratorium would do much to stabilize the world, and the patriotic everywhere were impressed and willing to try it.

Whether time will demonstrate that the plan is sound or not can only be conjectures, but it is a plan, and the only one that appears sound and useful. The many suggestions that flood the country and fill the public prints may be more than froth and mind moss, but none of them so far have seemed worthy of trial. The Hoover plan is before us. It looks like an opportunity—and a chance is the sum total that business men and government can suggest to-day. Therefore, it should be passed and tried out, and the experience gained, even if we must pay for it, as we have paid for all the experience of the years since men first began to trade with each other.

I am opposed to the cancellation of the debts. When we vote for this resolution we vote against the cancellation or reduction of intergovernmental debts, for section 5 makes an emphatic declaration that it is against the policy of Congress to cancel or reduce any of the indebtedness of foreign countries to the United States. We loaned the money to our friends—the Allies. Individuals have the same failing, they lend to their friends and make enemies when they try to collect. It is true that at the time the money was advanced money had a different value; that it was earned when we were on a basis of high wages and high commodity prices.

In paying us back, the task of the foreigner will be greater than that of the people who earned and loaned it. But the same condition exists in connection with every loan to business concerns and individuals in this country and exists in connection with every mortgage made by our own people and all other forms of indebtedness standing over a period of time. The Government bonds of our own country are in similar shape. It is the chance that borrowers take; it is the chance that investors take. Never has this change in money value been an excuse for a debtor to evade making as honest an effort to pay as he is capable of making. And it is less an excuse for the foreign debtors of the United States, for in the readjustment and settlement of the debts they were scaled down and much was forgiven—more than the difference in the buying power of money when the credits were advanced than now.

What will be the effect if the joint resolution providing the moratorium is not passed? It will not only be a rebuke to the President for suggesting the only plan to aid the world in its present distressing condition, but such action will destroy much of the confidence that has already undergone such a frightful strain and plunge business into greater and more disastrous discouragement, just at a time when hope for improvement is highest in the hearts of the people.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make plain my position and present thought on this pending resolution. I voted in the Ways and Means Committee against the favorable report of this joint resolution and against its passage in the House. If it were a mere postponement of payment for one year, when the moratorium was to end and payments thereafter to continue, I would not care so much; but evidently the approval of this moratorium resolution means much more, and will be so considered by the European countries indebted to the United States for moneys borrowed and heretofore scaled down by the World War Foreign Debt Commission and definitely settled by act of Congress with approval of all countries affected to be paid over a long period of years.

I felt that the President of the United States should have called Congress in special session for consideration of his proposal for a moratorium and possible cancellation of over $10,000,000,000 due the United States, for it was not lawful without approval of Congress. It was delayed by the deliberate act of the President, to be taken up when Congress met in December, six months after the President had acted, and to be rushed through Congress and voted upon even before the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee were printed and made available to over 400 Members of the House of Representatives not members of said committee—no such pressure and rush ever before. The postponement or moratorium for one year had become an accomplished fact by the act of the Chief Executive. Shall we by this action here hold out to foreign countries the hope that these debts will be canceled, scaled down again, or readjusted by further investigation as to capacity of these countries to pay their debts to the United States, having heretofore been scaled down by settlements approved by the several governments so indebted? The joint resolution reported from the committee to the House reads as follows:

Resolved, etc., That in the case of each of the following countries: Austria, Belgium, Czechoslovakia, Estonia, Finland, France, Germany, Great Britain, Greece, Hungary, Italy, Latvia, Lithuania, Poland, Rumania, and Yugoslavia, the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is authorized to make, on behalf of the United States, an agreement with the government of such country to postpone the payment of any amount payable during the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1931, by such country to the United States in respect of its bonded indebtedness to the United States, except that in the case of Germany the agreement shall relate only to amounts payable by Germany to the United States during such fiscal year in respect of the costs of the army of occupation.

SEC. 2. Each such agreement on behalf of the United States shall provide for the payment of the postponed amounts, with interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum beginning July 1, 1933, in 10 equal annuities, the first to be paid during the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1933, and one during each of the nine fiscal years following, each annuity to be payable in one or more installments.

SEC. 3. No such agreement shall be made with the government of any country unless it appears to the satisfaction of the President that such government has made or has given satisfactory assurances of willingness and readiness to make with the government of each of the other countries indebted to such country in respect of war, relief, or reparation debts an agreement in respect of such debt substantially similar to the agreement authorized by this joint resolution to be made with the government of such creditor country on behalf of the United States.

SEC. 4. Each agreement authorized by this joint resolution shall be made so that payments of annuities under such agreement shall unless otherwise provided in the agreement (1) be in accordance with the provisions contained in the agreement made with the government of such country under which the payment to be postponed is payable and (2) be subject to the same terms and conditions as payments under such original agreement.

SEC. 5. It is hereby expressly declared to be against the policy of Congress that any of the indebtedness of foreign countries to the United States should be in any manner canceled or reduced; and nothing in this joint resolution shall be construed as indicating a contrary policy, or as implying that favorable consideration will be given at any time to a change in the policy hereby declared.

Section 5 was added by the committee to the original resolution, prepared at the instance of the Treasury Department, and evidently said section 5 was not in accord with the proposal of the administration, for the President in his message to Congress asked or suggested, that the Foreign Debt Commission be revived, so as to determine again the capacity of these several foreign countries to pay their indebtedness to the United States; and the fact that 9 out of the 10 Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee voted against said section 5, and the fact that they so voted, evidenced their desire to be in accord with the President and the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon, and wanted no declaration against cancellation or reduction of said debts.

No nation had refused to pay, nor asked for a moratorium. I was not in accord with those who desired a moratorium to open the door to cancellation or further scaling down of these debts. I can not get away from the conclusion that the approval of this moratorium leads to cancellation and that it had its birth and origin in the desire to relieve private investments in foreign loans and securities invested abroad, out of the profits exacted from the toiling masses in this country, who by their labor and industry on farm and in factory create the wealth necessary for the life and preservation of our country.

This proposal for a 1-year moratorium seemed to me to open the door for further and longer moratoriums and partial, if not full, cancellation as advocated by private individuals and corporations, who wanted to enhance the value of their private investments by lifting the first mortgage or indebtedness due the United States and transfer this indebtedness to the taxpayers of the United States, who are suffering now from heavy and unusual burdens. This moratorium was conceived and intended to help strengthen Germany in its resistance to payment of reparations, which would help to lead to reduction of all foreign debts due the Government of the United States. The proposal of the President, as stated in his message to Congress, reads as follows:

In June I informed the governments concerned, "The American Government proposes the postponement during one year of all payments on intergovernmental debts, reparation and relief debts, both principal and interest; of course, not including obligations of government held by private parties."

The passage of this moratorium joint resolution lays the foundation for repudiation of all war debts, even though the loans were made after the war. Section 5 was not in accord with the message of the President nor the utterances of Secretary Mellon, was not in the original resolution submitted to Congress, and was voted against by 9 of the 10 Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee, who desired to reflect only the wishes of the administration; and this section will not bind the President in his future conduct, nor will it bind any subsequent Congress. Let governments repudiate their debts to other governments and stability fails and faith between nations will break down, and no more intergovernment loans be made; cancel all European government debts, and only armaments will protect countries not in friendly accord. The sacred honor of these governments was pledged to pay the amounts agreed on after a thorough investigation of capacity to pay, made by the Foreign Debt Commission. I am opposed to reviving that commission for any purpose, even though proposed by President Hoover.

We are refusing now to recognize Russia, because she will not agree to pay debts incurred by prior governments of Russia. Shall we wipe the slate clean and forgive all foreign governmental debts? This moratorium would never have been proposed except for the large private loans made abroad. Why should the taxpayers of the United States bear this additional burden of a war born in Europe? These foreign loans, when repaid, were to be applied to the payment of our Liberty bonds and to reduce our war debt. Why relieve foreign countries and saddle the payment upon the American taxpayers, who purchased these bonds to furnish money to the United States to carry on the war and to make these loans?

Let governments repudiate their debts and the example will be followed in the business world and honesty will disappear and moral degradation will follow.

I could not see my way clear to follow President Hoover after a full and careful consideration of this moratorium proposal, so I voted against it in committee and in the House. I followed the dictates of my own conscience and my intelligence and the facts as they were developed, as best I could, and tried to represent as far as I could the wishes and judgment of those back in State and district who bear now a heavy burden, which I hope may be lifted in a measure when commerce and trade may be restored and just laws be enacted helpful to all alike.

If the United States was not concerned with reparations due by Germany to certain European governments for damages done in the World War, when it lent billions of dollars to our former allies, why should the United States by voluntary action become entangled in European controversies over reparations, which, when repudiated by Germany, will invite other nations indebted to us to ask for further cancellation of their debts due the United States? Why does the President ask now for the re-creation of the Foreign Debt Commission to determine the present capacity of our foreign debtors to pay, knowing that it would be an encouragement to Germany to cease further payment of reparations and an invitation to the other governments to ask for a reduction or cancellation of their debts to us by reason of Germany's refusal to further pay reparations? Has not the President by his moratorium proposal, now by his action an accomplished fact, invited cessation of reparations and further reduction of debts due us by nations who had not asked for this moratorium and, as we are told, were ready to pay their debts to us? Germany's debt to us was only about $6,000,000 and was of no moment in the proposed moratorium.

Has the action of the President been explained to the satisfaction of the people of the United States, who will bear this additional burden if these debts are canceled or further reduced? If these European governments favorably respond to the invitation of the President to open up again these debt settlements, the taxpayers of the United States will bear these additional burdens.

It is charged that the United States furnished Germany the moneys to pay the reparations, and when paid to France and other European countries these moneys were returned to pay what they owed the United States.

German bonds by the millions have been negotiated and sold in this country and are now depreciated in value, and those who hold German and other foreign securities cry aloud for cancellation of intergovernment debts. Turn on the light and let us have all the facts.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, privileged to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the moratorium resolution makes it advisable, in my judgment, to set forth briefly the reason for favorable vote by me upon that measure.

On June 22, 1931, President Hoover wired me as follows:

> You no doubt have seen my statement in Sunday's press of the proposals of the American Government in respect to postponement for one year of all international debts. Inasmuch as the proposal is, of course, contingent upon action by Congress and as the matter is one of national interest, having no partisan character in that light, I consulted before action the Senators and Representatives of both parties present in Washington and as many as possible who were accessible in the country. This list of generous support from Members was shown in the public statement referred to above. I regret that difficulties of communication rendered it impossible to contact with all Members of the Senate and House. I do not wish to press any Member for reply as to his views if he preferred not to give them at this time, yet if you are favorable to the proposal in the first paragraph of the statement above mentioned, it would undoubtedly aid in the negotiation now in progress if you could inform me thereof.

> HERBERT HOOVER.

Being of the very decided opinion that conditions in this country demanded just as serious attention as those abroad, and because of the President's statement that a suspension in the payment of intergovernmental debts for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1931, would tend to help conditions abroad, I felt that instead of this vote by telegram, this unofficial action by Congress, and this very unusual way to deal with matters peculiarly belonging to Congress, that it would have been far more helpful if an immediate session of Congress had been called to deal not only with the international situation but also with conditions in the United States. I therefore sent the following telegram:

> Am in favor of postponement for one year of all intergovernmental debts, but at the same time I think some relief to business and the individual in this country, such as changes in taxation policy and very decided and definite, if not almost total, rewriting of recent Republican tariff law, should be accomplished. Assuming your telegram is for purpose of assuring certain and speedy action by Congress in December, in lieu of special session being called, it is my opinion that the subject of your telegram might very properly be coupled with other anticipated action by present Congress along the lines I have suggested and a suffering people, not tariffized business at home, be relieved now instead of permitting such relief to be delayed through the next winter. In other words, if relief abroad can be accomplished without extra session of Congress, but relief at home can not, and the latter must be held up until late during the next session, I think special session of Congress should be called.

> WILLIAM P. COLE, Jr.,
> Second District of Maryland.

I am glad to find a comfortable majority in the House of Representatives, which is now controlled by the Democrats, approving the moratorium resolution, because it should mean a very liberal attitude by the Democratic Party toward terrible conditions existing in our country to-day. In my judgment much of the unemployment, business depression, bank failures, and condition of mind amongst our people can be directly attributed to the tariff bill passed by the last Republican Congress and to the failure of the present Republican administration to sense the seriousness of the situation which has existed now for over a year and which is steadily growing worse. The Democratic Party has always been the people's party, and if any one thing tends toward the building up of the morale and activity on the part of our people and business, it will undoubtedly be through the instrumentality of the program sponsored, the wisdom displayed, and the votes cast by the Democratic Party now controlling the House of Representatives for the first time in many years.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, in the short time allotted it is not possible for me to thoroughly discuss the intricate questions involved in the resolution which we have before us, but I should like to make a few observations. It is my intention to support this resolution for the reason I deem it my duty to keep faith with our President. The questions involved should not be made political in any sense of the word. When I answered the President's telegram last June I wired him as follows:

> Hon. HERBERT HOOVER,
> President of the United States,
> White House, Washington, D. C.:
> Answering your telegram in reference to your proposal to postpone for one year all intergovernmental debts, I am in favor of your proposal and will support same.

It was my intent then, and it is my purport now, to support a 1-year moratorium, believing by so doing I am aiding in a small way to relieve chaotic conditions in Germany, and thereby preventing a very disastrous situation throughout the entire world. I can not emphasize too strongly, however, my opposition to any debt cancellation or further extension of the moratorium over a period of one year.

In voting for this resolution and thereby keeping faith with the President, I am ever mindful of our home conditions and can not refrain from taking this opportunity to urge specific legislation to take care of the present unemployment situation that confronts us. Further, I should like to join with my distinguished colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY] in urging that we pass early in this session of the Congress legislation that will, first, provide adequate pensions for the widows and orphans of the veterans of the World War, and, second, authorizing the cash payment in full of the adjusted-service certificates or so-called bonus.

In enacting measures covering these important subjects we will prove to the people of America that their country is not ungrateful to the men who fought her battles, nor is she unmindful of the interests and needs of her own citizens in so far as their personal welfare is concerned.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Speaker, if the moratorium were an isolated matter which could not involve us further, and especially if we were prosperous, I would support it as an evidence of international good will and as a friendly gesture to the young German Republic, which we all wish to succeed.

It, however, appears to me to be one of a series of steps in which the welfare of this Nation has been and is being sacrificed to selfish interests both at home and abroad. This series began with the debt-funding agreements of 1925 and will, unless checked, lead us to disaster.

There is no doubt that the measure will be ratified. The Under Secretary of the Treasury has stated that 276 Members of this House and 68 Senators pledged themselves to support it by telegram last June. Neither my voice nor vote will prevent it. Nevertheless, as a protest against the whole tenor and tendency of our relations to Europe, I will cast my vote against it. It will be a minority vote, but I am persuaded that no damage, but only good, can come from a strong minority notice to the world that Congress and the American people have grown tired of being Santa Claus to the universe.

The time is now at hand when we must conserve the resources of America to take care of Americans!

I was in doubt about this proposal when it was first made last June. Nevertheless, so anxious was I to support the President in any constructive measure for the rehabilitation of America that I came here with an open mind, anxious to hear the evidence and to support it if I could. I have heard the evidence, and instead of removing my doubt it has strengthened it. I resolve that doubt in favor of the United States.

I am glad that this resolution has not been made a partisan question. It has been wisely left to the conscience of each Member. The times are too serious for political snipe shooting. We must all put our hands to the wheel. The ship of state is struggling to make headway against one of the two or three greatest hurricanes in our history. The American people will not forgive any member of the crew who plays political poker when all hands are needed on deck.

I have already listened with dismay to too much bickering on both sides of the aisle. And I especially deplore the attack, made by a Republican, on the official and personal integrity of the President of the United States. He may be wrong. He may have listened to wrong advice—the advice of international bankers with selfish interests at stake. I believe he has. But he is not corrupt.

When the President wired me last June I replied as follows:

> Please be assured that I will look at this question as an American and not as a partisan and will be glad to support your proposal in December if my informed judgment at that time leads me to conclude that the interests of this Nation will be promoted and not sacrificed by such action.
> It would seem to me, however, that all that was necessary to meet the apparent emergency in Europe would have been your simple statement that you proposed to recommend a moratorium to Congress when it meets in December rather than at this time to ask its Members as separate individuals to commit themselves to a course of action of momentous possibilities without the benefit of complete discussion.
> I can only say at this time that I am opposed to the general principle that Europe makes wars and preparations for future wars and that the United States pays for them. A postponement or eventual reduction of debts owed the United States should be made strictly contingent upon a genuine reduction of armament.
> It seems to me that such a course would have possibilities of real benefits to us and to the world of immeasurable value as against the brief exhilaration of a temporary breathing spell. As long as Europe squanders huge sums on armament, help from the American taxpayer is less than futile.

I felt then and I feel now that Congress should have been called in special session if the necessities of the situation required emergency action. We could have convened, deliberated, and voted in the same time that the French Chamber took in passing upon it. We have had many other crises in international affairs in our history, but never before—and I have this on the authority of the experts in the Library of Congress—has a President attempted to commit Congress as separate individuals, without the benefit of all the facts, without the views of each other, on a legislative matter. It is a bad precedent. Next July 1st this moratorium will expire. Will it again be renewed without the legal consent of the American people expressed through their representatives? I hope not. Despite all the delays of constitutional government, I still favor it as against government by Western Union.

But this water is over the dam. Whether the President acted wisely and within his constitutional powers is not now the question. We must now decide the question on its merits.

When a proposal arises as to extending time for the payment of a debt these simple questions naturally occur:

First. Why does the debtor ask it?

Second. Is the debtor able to pay?

Third. Has the debtor been living within his means, or has he been spending extravagantly?

Fourth. If the debtor has been spending money foolishly, what assurance does he now give that hereafter he will adjust his mode of living so that an honest debt can be paid?

Fifth. Is the creditor in a position, himself, to wait for payment?

Sixth. Has the creditor in the past been a Shylock, or has he been generous?

Seventh. Will the creditor benefit by waiting?

It is my judgment, after examining all the evidence which it has been permitted us to see—and I here call attention to the fact that this resolution is being rushed to a vote before we have seen the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee—that a satisfactory answer to not a single one of these questions has been made. Let me take them up in order. But first, it is not to be forgotten that this whole proposition is an abandonment of the policy of President Coolidge—not to permit the question of debts due us to be linked with the reparations due our debtors.

The proposal is to "postpone during one year all payments on intergovernmental debts, reparations," and so forth. And as my colleague from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] has said:

> We all know that our debtor nations depend on the payments by Germany to these other countries. If the economic system of Germany had broken down so that they could not pay what they owe, in turn, those who owe us would have the same excuse for not paying us.

We have abandoned, therefore, the policy of President Coolidge, and by linking reparations with debts, we find ourselves once more in central Europe up to our ears.

WHY IS THE EXTENSION ASKED?

This might first be put in this form—who is asking it? I thought last summer that the request came, in the first instance, at least, from Great Britain. We are now amazed to ascertain for the first time that neither England, France, nor Italy had asked for it. The chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, which conducted the hearings, has stated on the floor that—

> It was initiated by the President of the United States, and I do not think there were any other requests.

Instead of the debtor asking the creditor for time, the creditor suggests to the debtor that he need not pay. This is an astonishing proposition. How long would the cashier of a bank hold his job if he extended notes without request before they fell due? How long would the bank remain open?

I do not doubt that our debtor nations were pleased at Mr. Hoover's suggestion, except France, who modified it in her own interest, but the fact remains that none of them had asked it. The fact is that not even Germany had asked for a moratorium. Germany, under the Young plan, had the right by contract with her creditors to ask for a moratorium on her own initiative, but had not done so. It is true that President von Hindenburg had sent a communication to President Hoover, dated June 20—the very day of the proposal, and two days after it was first mentioned to France—but no request had been made by Germany to her principal creditors. It is also to be noted that all that Germany had to pay this country during the year was the relatively insignificant sum of $6,000,000, on account of the costs of the army of occupation. At this point I attach a schedule of the amounts payable during the fiscal year 1932 by foreign governments on account of their indebtedness to the United States:

Amounts payable during the fiscal year 1932 by foreign governments on account of their indebtedness

Country	Principal	Interest	Total
Austria	$287,556		$287,556
Belgium	4,200,000	$3,750,000	7,950,000
Czechoslovakia	3,000,000		3,000,000
Estonia	108,012	492,360	600,372
Finland	55,000	257,295	312,295
France	11,363,500	38,636,500	50,000,000
Great Britain	28,000,000	131,520,000	159,520,000
Greece	660,000	449,080	1,109,080
Hungary	12,270	57,072	69,342
Italy	12,200,000	2,506,125	14,706,125
Latvia	44,664	205,989	250,653
Lithuania	38,615	185,930	224,545
Poland	1,325,000	6,161,835	7,486,835
Rumania	800,000		800,000
Yugoslavia	250,000		250,000
Total	62,344,617	184,222,186	246,566,803
Germany, army costs	6,000,000		6,000,000
Total	68,344,617	184,222,186	252,566,803

From this it will be seen that we are to postpone payments from 16 foreign governments—none of whom, with the possible exception of Germany, had asked us to do so. It is worth noting also that 7 or 8 of these 16 nations are countries to which Germany is in no way indebted. Our leniency with them, therefore, could in no manner benefit Germany. One of these nations actually had the money here in this country to meet the payments.

WHY, THEN, WAS THE EXTENSION INITIATED?

The answer to this I quote from an article by the distinguished and disinterested historian, Charles A. Beard, in December Harper's:

> The latest form of government interference with "the natural course" of economy is the suspension of payments due the United States from foreign powers on account of lawful debts and the proposal to give public support to "frozen assets." What was the source of inspiration here? American investment bankers having got themselves into a jam in their efforts to make easy money now demand Government assistance. In 1927 one of the most distinguished German economists told the writer of this article that the great game in his country, as in other parts of Europe, was to borrow billions from private bankers in the United States so that it would ultimately be impossible to pay reparations, the debts due the Federal Government, and then the debts owed to private parties. The expected result? American bankers would then force their Government to forego its claims for the benefit of private operators who wanted to make bankers' commissions and 8 or 10 per cent on their money. Well, the game worked. American taxpayers are to be soaked and American bankers are to collect—perhaps.

I also quote the following from Business Week:

> Of all the mountains of debt the public loans can be most easily lifted because the creditors are millions of mute taxpayers instead of a relatively few vocal individual investors and institutions.

It is to be noted that the President's statement of June 20 used these words:

> The American Government proposes the postponement during the year of all payments on intergovernmental debts, reparations, and relief debts, both principal and interest, of course, not including obligations of governments held by private parties.

No, "of course" not.

While public obligations are extended for one year, private debts held by American bankers and investors are to be paid. The international bankers are in favor of extending all debts except the debts due them. The bondholder gets, the taxpayer forgets, or is asked to. The banks have not yet suggested the necessity for the cancellation of the debts due them. Doctor Melchoir, of Switzerland, has recently stated that in the past six months—while the moratorium has been in practical effect—Germany has paid $230,000,000—almost as much as the entire moratorium figure—on short-term credits. In other words, the bankers have collected while we waited.

The next step is another moratorium, more negotiations, further reductions, and then, finally, cancellation. In his message the President disclaims cancellation, but says, "It will be necessary in some cases to make still further temporary adjustments," and advocates the re-creation of the World War Foreign Debt Commission with "authority to examine such problems as may arise in connection with these debts." What problems, may I ask? The debt commission was originally created to pare down the war debts due this Government in accordance with our debtors' "capacity to pay." What function would it serve if we re-created it?

If Europe owes us public debts of $11,000,000,000 and private debts of a like or greater sum and can not pay both, it is to the interest of the private creditors that the public debt be first postponed and then canceled. If Uncle Sam, so to speak, holds a first mortgage on Europe for billions of dollars and our bankers hold a second mortgage of billions more, it is obvious that the second mortgage is improved if the first mortgage is released. It is now admitted by its president that one New York bank alone—the National City—participated in floating more than $1,000,000,000 of private loans to Europe since the war, with profits from the underwriting of $24,000,000. As Mr. Beard said, in the article referred to, "The game worked. American taxpayers are to be soaked and American bankers are to collect—perhaps."

"Perhaps." What a fine thing it would be if after Europe scaled down billions of her public debts in the funding agreements, she then borrowed billions more from our kind-hearted bankers (for a commission, "of course") and then finally refused to pay either public or private obligations!

This money loaned abroad went, of course, to employ foreign labor and to build up foreign industry in competition with our own. We lift ourselves by our bootstraps and get rich by throwing our riches away.

I am not an isolationist, but I fail to see the logic of the argument that we can prosper by loaning money to Europe with which to buy our goods. After settlement is made for the goods, the debt remains unpaid. If we are "isolationists," the fault lies not in insisting upon the payment of debts justly due us, but in erecting trade barriers. It is the Hawley-Smoot tariff and the reprisals it provoked which have isolated us. If we want to help Europe to pay us, let us negotiate reciprocal trade agreements under which goods useful to both and harmful to neither can be exchanged.

One point about this whole matter has not been discussed at any time in the course of debate. I refer to the funding agreements and our subsequent generosity. In the funding agreements of the Coolidge administration in 1924–1926 we scaled down the obligation of our debtors—figured on a 4¼ per cent interest basis, the rate on most of our Liberty bonds by which the money was raised—we scaled down these obligations to the tune of $10,705,618,006.90. This debt was in effect taken off the back of Europe and placed on the backs of the American taxpayers, who must raise the money to redeem the Liberty bonds. (These figures were prepared in 1929 by the Treasury Department at the request of Theodore Burton, of Ohio, a member of the Debt Funding Commission.) We settled with Great Britain—figured on 4¼ per cent interest rate—at 80 cents on the dollar, with France at 47 cents, with Italy at 24 cents, and so forth, giving them 62 years in which to pay.

We canceled these enormous sums on the basis of "capacity to pay." At the same time we were doing this our international bankers were loaning billions of fresh money to Europe. Europe did not have the "capacity to pay" her public debts, but she, in the opinion of our bankers, had the capacity to borrow billions of new obligations. She was a poor risk for Uncle Sam but a good risk for our bankers. Does it not look as if everyone was taken care of except the American taxpayer? I submit that if European industry, railroads, and municipalities were a good risk for private American credit, Europe could have paid her governmental obligations due the United States Treasury for the reason that by the taxing power the debtor governments could reach every dollar of private assets and earning power, which were the basis of credit for these new private loans.

In an article by Garet Garrett in the Saturday Evening Post of September 26, 1931, it appears that we have loaned Germany more new money than she has paid on her reparations. It is further worth our attention to note that none of our principal European debtors have yet paid us a penny on their war debt out of their own resources. They have simply paid us a small part of what they have collected from Germany. And, as far as Germany is concerned, her budget, according to a recent dispatch from Basle, Switzerland, is $925,000,000 greater than in 1926. The whole process amounts to a substitution of private debts for the debts due Uncle Sam. And now Mr. Albert H. Wiggin, of the Chase National Bank, is, as he says—firmly convinced that it would be good business for our Government to initiate a reduction of these (public) debts at this time.

In all American history has there ever been such a betrayal of the rights of the plain people as this? They subscribed for Liberty bonds and war savings stamps to loan to our allies "until it hurt." They mortgaged their farms and their homes and future earnings to pay for these bonds. They bought Liberties at 100 and later, driven by necessity, sold them at 85. And now, while private obligations are, "of course," excluded, they are asked in this year of grace 1931 to tax and bond themselves to the tune of $252,566,803 to carry the postponed payments due us from Europe. There are 120,000,000 people in America. The moratorium therefore this year imposes a load on our shoulders of a little more than $2 for every man, woman, and child in this country. There are in my district 368,000 people. Applying this $2 per capita to my district means an expense to it this year, in either fresh taxes or new bonds, of $736,000. I am not aware that I hold any mandate from my constituents to impose this or any other sum on them.

WERE OUR DEBTORS ABLE TO PAY?

From the preceding table it will be seen that the bulk of the postponed amount of $252,566,803 was to have been paid by Great Britain—$159,520,000; France, $50,000,000; and Italy, $14,706,125; a total for the three countries of $224,226,125. With respect to Italy, Mussolini gave out a public statement last summer that Italy was prepared to pay and had not asked for a moratorium. With respect to Great Britain the chairman of the Ways and Means has stated on the floor, "If we had insisted, I believe England would have paid." Only last week Mr. Chamberlain is reported to have assured the House of Commons that all British foreign obligations could be met. The London Telegram has just said:

President Hoover unfolded a melancholy story, showing that the Federal Treasury is in a far worse position than the British Exchequer.

Then we come to France. She was to have paid this year $50,000,000. She is the most prosperous nation in the world to-day. Her gold reserves exceed ours. She has no unemployed to speak of, as against our six or seven millions. She has a balanced budget, as against our indicated deficit for this fiscal year, according to the President's message, of $2,123,000,000. While we are going into the red $6,000,000 a day, France has on deposit to her account in this country enough gold to threaten a run on our own banks. While we were postponing $50,000,000 from France, she voluntarily withdrew during September and October $700,000,000 of gold coin and bullion from the banks of this country, or one-sixth of our entire supply of gold. She has on deposit here at this time a half billion dollars, and yet her payment of one-tenth of that amount is to be postponed and put on the backs of the American people.

I quote at this point a paragraph written by Garet Garrett in the Saturday Evening Post of December 12, 1931, entitled, "Opening the Golden Goose":

OPENING THE GOLDEN GOOSE

To the further education of American credit abroad now enter these autumnal sights and experiences, videlicet:

First. The gold honor of the American dollar impugned in Europe, where our lending of it had been so prodigal. Our credit impugned by our debtors! And for what reason? For the reason that we had been too free with it; precisely for the reason that our debtors knew they had borrowed too much on poor security.

Second. The rationally impossible spectacle of debtor nations raiding the gold reserves of a creditor nation while the creditor is self-bound under an agreement not to collect its debts from them.

Third. The strange experience of a creditor nation finding itself beholden to one of its principal debtors, the debtor undertaking on grounds of generosity and helpfulness to stop raiding the creditor's gold reserves short of the point at which the creditor's gold solvency might seem in jeopardy.

Fourth. The sight of public ovations in this the creditor country to the premier of one of its principal debtors, when he comes to tell us that more of Europe's war debts must be charged to the American taxpayer in a spirit of international friendship; more public ovations as he departs, saying he has our official promise to consider it.

Our obligations to Europe were payable in gold; her obligations to us were payable in depreciated paper, or not at all. The offset of a quarter of a billion which we had was wiped out by Mr. Hoover's generous gesture. While France owes us billions she takes away one-sixth of our gold! And Mr. Hoover, representing the creditor, has to ask Monsieur Laval, representing the debtor, to "stop the flow of gold from New York to France."

I am quite persuaded that if an international exposition of suckers were held that we would take first prize.

Granting our kindness in giving Europe our shirt, we trust we will give no offense if we request the retention of our trousers.

Out of the war we got what we asked for—nothing. France had frightful losses, but in judging her ability to pay it is worth noting that her per capita gold amounts to $57 while ours is $42. From the war she received her lost Provinces, containing 5,600 square miles and a population of 1,700,000 of some of the most highly skilled artisans in Europe; she doubled her ore capacity; she got mines producing 6,000,000 tons of coal and 65,000 tons of crude oil annually; she got potash mines yielding 2,000,000 tons annually, thus breaking the German potash monopoly; her railways carry more people than our own despite our greater mileage; her merchant fleet has grown prodigiously while ours has languished. And still she is not able to pay us $50,000,000!

WILL THE MORATORIUM BENEFIT US?

Has it done so? Let us look at the figures. We are worse off to-day than we were in June, despite the fact that in June we had already gone through 18 months of terrific deflation of values.

Here are corresponding figures for June 24—the date of the President's telegram to the Members of Congress—and the day we are voting to confirm those telegrams, December 18, 1931, of our largest farm crops and some of the best stocks in America:

Stocks, closing prices

Corn, December	.50⅝	.36¾
Chicago hogs, average per hundredweight	6.60	4.10
Cotton, mid-upland, pound	.0980	.0635

The current crop of wheat is worth less than it was when the moratorium was proposed by some $45,000,000; the corn in the country is worth about $350,000,000 less; cotton is worth about $240,000,000 less.

The shrinkage in the market value of all securities listed on the New York Stock Exchange is as follows:

July 1, 1931	$96,550,043,334
Dec. 1, 1931	70,617,665,740
	25,932,377,594

The purpose of the moratorium, according to the President, was "to give the forthcoming year to the economic recovery of the world." * * * Has it had that result? Half the year is gone and the holders of American securities are $26,000,000,000 worse off than in June. This has not been due to any uncertainty that the moratorium would be ratified. The telegrams assured its confirmation. Yet the President has guessed wrong by $26,000,000,000 to say nothing of the shrinkage of wheat, corn, cotton, and all other commodities.

Men have said that our condition would have been worse if the moratorium had not been granted. How do they know that? Is their guess any better than Mr. Hoover's? As against the known they place the unknown. They oppose guesses to facts. They indulge in hypotheses and say that they have proved their case.

And when we speak of the "economic recovery of the world" it is worth considering whether its economic recovery can be aided by merely shifting the debt from the backs of those who owe it to the backs of those to whom it is due. The debt remains. It can never be canceled; it can never be lightened, so long as the bonds owing by America to Americans remain to be paid. When men talk about "wiping out the war debt" do they suggest that this Government repudiate the outstanding Liberty bonds?

We are a part of the "world." It might benefit Europe and hurt us to shift the debt from her back to ours, but how will it help the "world"? Will it help the "world" to have the American taxpayers carry the load of Europe's war?

HAVE WE ALREADY BEEN GENEROUS?

I have already touched on this head. Take Germany. We exacted not a dollar of indemnity; we took not a foot of her soil. The only reimbursement which we asked was a partial repayment of the costs of the army of occupation and settlement for damage done to American ships and cargoes by her submarine warfare. We were chivalrous to a brave foe. President Wilson was human and made mistakes, but he prevented the "march to Berlin." It is to his eternal glory that he refused to sacrifice another American boy, to make another gold-star American mother in order to satisfy the blood lust of a war-mad world.

The treaty of Versailles was written in passion and conceived in hate. While it was being deliberated, Lloyd George made a political campaign on the promise to execute the Kaiser by public hanging. It will serve no useful purpose here to discuss the causes of the World War or the relative responsibility of the different European nations. But if injustice is in the treaty, who wrote it in? If Germany is being crushed, who is doing it? If impossible reparations have been exacted, who exacted them?

There is one simple fact about this whole business that we have forgotten. It was not our war in either its roots or its fruits.

Let us see if we have earned the title of Shylock from France. The American Government borrowed money from its own people to lend her at from 3½ to 4¼ per cent interest. To save her we placed 2,000,000 of the finest of our youth upon her shores. For their encampments we paid rent; for their graveyards we paid gold. We got nothing free. I am not complaining about that. It was for us to pay our way. At the end of the war we had $2,000,000,000 worth of supplies in France. We sold them to France for her promise to pay $400,000,000. That sum has been since canceled—"never mind the change." When we settled her war debt to us it amounted to $4,231,000,000. The settlement was equivalent to wiping it out to the last dollar, so far as principal is concerned. In lieu of this vast sum she agreed to pay us interest thereon at 2.17 per cent for 62 years, and then she is through. But this sum cost us more than 2.17 per cent. It cost us 3½ to 4¼ per cent. The interest which we have had to pay and are still paying to carry this debt exceeds by 2 per cent the rate she agreed to pay.

The bonds by which this money was raised to loan to France are still owing by this Government. Since the money was loaned we have paid in interest alone to carry this enormous debt the sum of $1,058,000,000, and France has paid us in all that time $200,000,000, leaving a deficit on interest-carrying charges alone for the American people to pay of $858,000,000, and only six years gone since the settlement was made. And that differential of interest rate in her favor and against us will go on for 62 years, or until our last bond is paid. During this one year of grace it will cost the American taxpayers in interest to carry the debt of France $169,000,000, and she is not even permitted to pay us $50,000,000.

While we are so busy saving the world it is worth while to ask this question: Who is going to balance our budget?

I do not blame France for looking after her interests. But I do insist that it is our business to look after our business.

Is it any wonder we have a deficit in this country? Thus far the American people are out of pocket on account of the French debt the sum of $5,260,000,000. And so on with our other 15 debtors.

HAVE OUR DEBTORS SPENT THEIR MONEY WISELY?

I said in reply to the President's telegram that "a postponement or reduction of debts should be made strictly contingent upon a genuine reduction in armament. * * * As long as Europe squanders huge sums for armament, help from the American taxpayer is less than futile."

Let us look at that for a moment. We gave the moratorium and got nothing for it—absolutely nothing. Here is what these debtors of ours are paying for arms.

What nations spend on arms

[Expenditures for the last fiscal year, figures at rounded par or in a few cases at the average of exchange, as compiled by the World Peace Foundation from the forthcoming League of Nations Armaments Year Book]

Austria	$14,507,320
Belgium	33,303,200
Czechoslovakia	51,189,000
Estonia	5,520,000
Finland	16,457,500
France	466,960,000
Germany	171,923,040
British Empire	726,731,065
Greece	21,340,800
Hungary	20,200,000
Italy	248,946,500
Latvia	7,860,000
Lithuania	5,680,000
Poland	92,072,000
Rumania	53,647,200
Yugoslavia	50,458,000
Total	1,986,799,625

The amount of the postponed debt of England, France, and Italy for this year is $224,227,125. The amount of their military expenditures for the last fiscal year, as shown by this table, is $1,442,637,565. In other words, Mr. Speaker, if our principal debtors reduced their preparations for the next war by 16 per cent they could pay the honest debts they owe us and not know it. The President himself said in his message:

> The burden of taxes to support armament is greater to-day than before the Great War.

We have given and are giving away our money by the millions and billions and obtain no benefit for it. We are taxing ourselves to bankruptcy in order that France and Europe may arm to the teeth. We who got nothing out of the war are paying our war debt and the debts of our allies, and the children of Americans yet unborn will still be struggling to pay them.

Since the funding agreement with Italy was made it has cost us in interest to carry her debt the sum of $538,000,000. How much has she paid during that time? Hold your breath and grip your chair. She has paid us $38,800,000. That is all. She was to have paid us $14,700,000 this year, but we have asked her not to burden us with it! Italy, when she does pay, pays us interest at the rate of 0.4 of 1 per cent. Is it any wonder that Mussolini makes a showing? The prosperity of France and Italy has in large part been paid for by us. Their capacity to pay exceeds our capacity to cancel.

On all the obligations which our debtors owed us at the end of the war our loss in the differential in interest rate alone will amount at the end of this fiscal year to $2,369,000,000.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, our loss in interest alone would cancel the prospective deficit to our people this year of $2,123,000,000—the greatest peace-time deficit in our history—with a quarter of a billion dollars to spare. As against 3½ per cent to 4¼ per cent interest paid on our Liberty bonds, Greece is paying, when permitted, one-fourth of 1 per cent; Italy, 0.4 of 1 per cent; Yugoslavia, 1.03 per cent; France, 2.17 per cent; and so forth.

The time has come for an American to call a halt. God grant that the civilization of Europe does not crumble into chaos; but if it does, let us try to save our own. It may be that these debts will not be paid. But let us not tear up the notes. So long as they are in our hands we can at least negotiate for disarmament and for world peace. The last war mobilized 60,000,000 men. It sent 10,000,000 soldiers to a soldier's grave. It made 7,000,000 widows and 15,000,000 orphans. It cost $150,000,000,000 at least. Who brought it about? Did we? Who will bring the next war to pass—a war that will probably wipe out such civilization as remains in Europe, if not throughout the world? The nations to which this moratorium applies are spending 65 per cent more for armament than in 1913. And while the race goes on we in the wisdom of Wall Street extend them more credit to buy more guns. Millions of unemployed here in the United States; a deficit of two billions; a mountain of taxes; banks failing by the thousands; farms being foreclosed; wage earners losing their homes; cities bankrupt; people hungry; school-teachers unpaid; insufficient hospitals for our veterans—and we continue to extend credit, public and private, to Europe!

More armament! Let us look to the future. If this ghastly insanity keeps on, the path ahead of us will again be made slippery with the warm red blood of mankind. The guns that Europe is buying with our money may some day be turned toward us. When the world declares a holiday in armament will be time enough to declare a holiday on debts. I know we can not collect our debts if our debtors refuse to pay. It may be that we are chasing rainbows; but if we can not find the pot of gold, let us at least keep the gold we have. Let us at least insist on payment. Let us say "Pay or repudiate." This may lead to disarmament more effectively than all the conferences of a century. If it does, we shall by this apparently hard-boiled and selfish action have done far more for the economic recovery of the world, more for Europe, more for Germany, than by bankrupting ourselves to make the next war possible.

Mr. Speaker, inventory time has come. It may be that the stream of events—the development of commerce, the narrowing of the Atlantic, the radio—has made vain the wisdom of Washington. I do not think so. It is true that we are closer to Europe in time and distance, but we are not closer in language, in traditions, in psychology, in understanding of her age-old quarrels. If anything, we have in these respects moved farther away from Europe than we were in 1776. We have been preoccupied for a century in developing a distinctly American Nation, an American tradition. It is not likely that our statesmen understand Europe nearly so well to-day as the men who wrote the Declaration of Independence—men who owed their allegiance abroad, who were largely educated abroad.

But whether this is right or wrong, before we take the final plunge in European affairs, let us at least reflect once more upon Washington's farewell words:

Let us constantly keep in mind—

He said—

that it is folly in one nation to look for disinterested favors from another; that it must pay with a portion of its independence for whatever it may accept under that character; that by such acceptance it may place itself in the condition of having given equivalents for nominal favors, and yet of being reproached with ingratitude for not giving more. There can be no greater error than to expect or calculate upon real favors from nation to nation. It is an illusion which experience must cure, which a just pride ought to discard.

"Reproached with ingratitude for not giving more." Does not that have a familiar sound?

Then, again:

Europe has a set of primary interests, which to us have none or a very remote relation. Hence, she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concern. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves by artificial ties in the ordinary vicissitudes of her policies or the ordinary combinations and collusions of her friendships or enmities.

Let the proponents of this moratorium and of all that it may lead to first answer the question of the wisest statesman, the purest patriot in our history—

"WHY QUIT OUR OWN TO STAND ON FOREIGN GROUND?"

We have abandoned the tradition of Washington under which we have grown great, and now under the wisdom of Wall Street and the guidance by greed we are asked to adopt a program under which we are rapidly becoming what George Bernard Shaw says we already are—"boobs."

I, for one, protest. If there are but a handful against this opening wedge toward cancellation, I will be one of the number. It is time for an American who loves his country—his own country—to speak in her behalf.

We have saved the world long enough. Let us save ourselves. The time has come when we must conserve the resources of America to take care of the needs of Americans.

Mr. GILLEN. Mr. Speaker, on June 24 last, I replied to the President's telegram of June 23 as follows:

Judgment is being withheld upon the debt moratorium proposed by you until I can give it careful study. I will be for the plan if I am convinced it will tend without question to relieve present conditions.

It was significant that stock and commodity prices began to go up soon after the proposal was announced. The general trend indicated material gains which would offset the loss of $243,000,000 for the fiscal year 1931–32. The advance in prices was of short duration; and when the wheat and corn harvest began, prices on these grains and other commodities sank to the lowest levels in several decades. There was no other visible evidence of "present conditions" being relieved.

My investigation of the facts showed that the Young plan provided a method for partial relief to Germany whenever she found she could not meet the reparation payments. Germany never asked for the relief afforded by the Young plan. Germany owes us no reparation. In order for us to give relief to Germany, we must first forgive the debts of our debtor nations, so they in turn can forgive Germany her reparation debts to them. The argument is that we will benefit indirectly by giving direct aid to Germany. The moratorium has been in effect for six months, and it is evident that benefits to the United States to date have been temporary only. The campaign cry of 1920, "That America first," meant a restoration to "normalcy" is peculiarly applicable at this time. Senator WATSON is reported to have said recently, in substance: "The trouble with our country is the American people have become European minded." The proposed debt holiday to Germany is evidence supporting the Senator's contention.

It is apparent that a certain group in this country have become "European minded." I refer to the international bankers. Under our economic system, credit is a necessity. For the past several years our basic industry, agriculture, has found the facilities for credit gradually growing less and less, until within the past two years the avenues of credit to the farmer have been closed almost in toto, while credit without stint has been given abroad. On July 3 the German ambassador informed me that the total indebtedness of Germany to private capital in the United States in the years 1925–1930 amounts to approximately one and one-fourth billion dollars. The indebtedness of German cities and municipalities swells the total in excess of $2,000,000,000. "America first" has meant nothing to this group.

It is evident that our debtor nations have subordinated their international debts to their armament policy. Of the annual debt of $243,000,000 owing to us by foreign countries, Italy, France, and Great Britain together owe $224,226,000. If Italy had diverted 4½ per cent, France 9 per cent, and Great Britain 25 per cent of their armament bidgets to the payment of their debt to us and Germany had scaled down her enormous budget for armament, the supposed necessity for a moratorium would not now be before us. The argument is that these countries did not do this; that we must face conditions as they exist. The necessity for lodging a protest against the enormous foreign expenditures for armaments persists at this time.

Many other facts might be mentioned here, but it is unnecessary, as they have been covered well in the debate to-day. In passing it might be said that the hearings on the moratorium resolution were concluded by the Committee on Ways and Means on yesterday afternoon. All of the evidence is not yet printed. The resolution is now up for passage within 24 hours after it was reported out of committee. No opportunity has been had to study the evidence submitted. The moratorium has been in effect without sanction of Congress for more than six months. Truly the haste can not be so great as to deny the Members of the House an opportunity to study the report of the committee and the facts placed before it.

Will we be asked to grant further extensions; to cancel the debts; to scale them down? All the facts and circumstances justify the prediction that persistent efforts will be made to these ends to the ultimate shifting of these debts to the taxpayers of the United States.

A vote for the moratorium smacks of an approval of internationalism as against nationalism; of putting the stamp of approval on capitalism lending aid abroad while our own industries suffer, of paving the way for cancellation or further scaling down of our international debts. While the moratorium is a controversial question, the best interests of our people prompt me to protest against it and vote in the negative.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I regret to find myself out of accord with what seems to be a majority of the Congress. I am against this resolution or any moratorium on European indebtedness to the United States. On June 20 last the President called to the White House a dozen or so Members of Congress, and after a secret session with them, gave out a statement from which I quote:

> Subject to confirmation by Congress, the American Government will postpone all payments upon the debts of foreign governments to the American Government payable during the fiscal year beginning July 1 next, conditional on a like postponement for one year of all payments on intergovernmental debts owing the important creditor powers.

This action could not be effective without the confirmation of Congress. The Congress was not in session, so a frenzied effort was made to secure pledges from a majority of its Members. The mail, telegraph, and telephone were called into action to secure pledges. In reply to the wire with which I was honored, I gave out a statement reading in part as follows:

> The administration passed a tariff bill that dislocated the commerce of the world, put millions of people out of work, and made it impossible for Germany to pay her bills, and we are now asked to postpone the evil day.
> To remit Germany's payment is equivalent to taking two or three hundred million out of the United States Treasury, but when we ask for a few million to feed hungry Americans it is characterized a dole that will undermine the self-reliance and stamina of our people. I shall probably vote for this suspension, but not until some steps are taken for our own unemployed.

It was my thought then and my thought now that the Congress should have been called in session to discuss and decide this matter. Believing that I realized the importance of this matter and the conditions then confronting the country, in early July I joined with other Members of Congress asking for an extra session for the following reasons:

First. To modify the tariff and arrange for reciprocal trade agreements with the nations of the world.

Second. To appropriate money to put some of the unemployed to work.

Third. Raise the income tax in the higher brackets, reenact the excess-profits tax, and strengthen the estates tax.

Remarking—

> Delay in legislation along these lines until winter again sets in is fraught with the gravest danger to the nation. The administration does not seem to realize the temper of the people.

No session was called, and now, with only two days' discussion, the matter is to be jammed through the House. I protest against that sort of procedure. If we stand by this sort of thing in the matter of legislation, why do we need a Congress at all? Who cares what a representative body shall do if certain leaders may be taken into the White House in secrecy any night of the year and upon their ipse dixit legislation shall be predicated and legislation passed? Why have a legislative body? Why not abolish it?

I have frequently said and now say to the House: To remit Germany's payment is equivalent to taking $250,000,000 out of the United States Treasury.

So long as we have a deficit in our own Treasury; so long as we have 6,000,000 unemployed men begging for work; so long as we have millions of women and children suffering for want of the necessities of life; so long as our farmers are forced to sell their crops below the cost of production; so long as the property owners of America are having their lands and their homes taxed from under them in order to meet the burden of public improvement—so long as these and other similar conditions prevail in our own country, I can not justify a vote to cancel or postpone the collection of one dollar of these foreign debts.

When gentlemen talk to me of what is transpiring abroad, let me ask them: Where is the biggest deficit to-day in the world? It is in the United States Treasury. Whenever any other country prates about its deficit and the necessity for balancing its budget, let me say that here at home is the biggest task in the world for the balancing of a budget and for the removal of a treasury deficit.

Oh, there is little thought of those upon whom the burden is to be placed. Says the President in a recent message there is a deficit of something over $900,000,000 to be met this year. How is that to be met? It is to be met by the most drastic, peace-time taxes ever exacted of our people. Do we realize that? There is a deficit of nine hundred and some-odd millions of dollars. Two hundred and fifty million dollars is the amount we are asked to give to those who owe us. Practically 25 per cent of the deficit which must be raised and met in this country arises from the fact that you to-day are voting to England, to France, and to Italy $250,000,000. Do you realize that?

Talk of budgets in England and in France. Here is the budget which ought to concern Congress, with a deficit of possibly $2,000,000,000 to face the American people in the near future. Talk of taxes abroad, and the necessity for helping Europe. Here is where taxes must be levied upon men who are already broke financially, men who are holding on to a little equity, hoping that they may pursue their lives again, and may again pick up the thread which seems broken with them. Here is the deficit, and with that deficit facing you, you are giving away $250,000,000 which belongs to your taxpayers, giving it away upon a moratorium which has never been adequately described to you.

So, giving away $250,000,000, you give it away, and then you make your people here in America pay for it. Do you not remember what came out of the war? No spoil was ours. The proudest thing America ever did was to do its duty in a great World War and ask neither reparations nor spoils. Who has the spoil of that war? Great Britain, France, and Italy.

Who had the reparations? Not ourselves or our country at all. Our country refused both the spoil of war and reparations of any kind. These debtors of ours are the ones who, clinging to the spoil, are seeking to-day to put the very cost of all the war upon the American people, and you to-day are going to assist them to put the cost of all that war upon the American people.

We saved Europe. It seems to me that it is high time for us to save America. For the past 15 years we have been engaged in the business of saving Europe; we have poured billions of dollars into the treasuries of Europe and enabled them to build up their industries and agriculture at the expense of the American people. We are now faced with a $2,000,000,000 deficit in our own Treasury. Seven millions of our fellow citizens are walking the streets in idleness, unable to secure the means of earning a decent livelihood.

Germany owes us little or no money, and we are asking nothing from her. Great Britain, with her high sense of honor and her bulldog determination, did not ask for this moratorium, and at whatever cost stands ready to pay; France the most prosperous nation in Europe, with more gold in her vaults than she ever had, in the language of the street, is "sitting on top of the world"; she could pay and should pay. Italy, I am advised, did not ask for this postponement, and would pay promptly if it is not granted. We, however, with our eyes across the water are in the business of saving Europe. For 15 years we have been in that business; we furnished them men and money to win the war; we furnished them money to rehabilitate themselves after the war; we refused any reparation and canceled their debt to us created by the war, and asked them to pay only what they borrowed after the war. We have played Santa Claus long enough. If they want to renege, let them do so. For years we have been snipe hunting in Europe, and always left holding the bag.

Whence, then, comes the pressure for this moratorium? Outside of administration circles I find no American sentiment except from the international bankers; they have loaned to Europe $7,000,000,000. They, the bankers, want this moratorium and the eventual cancellation of the Government debt, to the end that they may collect their $7,000,000,000. These bankers realize they have made a bad investment and are now willing that the American taxpayers shall lose their $11,000,000,000 if the bankers can save their own investments and reputations. This Capitol has been crowded for the past week with these bankers urging this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, there are a number of needs for this $250,000,000 in America which, I think, come far ahead of the granting of this enormous dole to our foreign debtors.

There are 7,000,000 people unemployed in this country. I would infinitely prefer to vote this $250,000,000 to the unemployed in America rather than give it to European governments with which to raise big armies and build greater navies.

I would much prefer to give it to people in America, many of whom are hungry, many of whom are in want, many of whom have not warm clothes, rather than donate this money to our foreign debtors.

It will be recalled that a year ago, when there was want and destitution in a large section of this country, the President vigorously and successfully opposed aid by Congress to our own destitute people on the ground that such a course would constitute a dole, and said that any assistance given to them should come from private sources.

Mr. Speaker, the administration would do well to withdraw its eyes from Europe and try to visualize the situation in America and look upon the spectacle of hunger, woe, and despair everywhere among our own people. Gaze into the wan faces of men, women, and children who tramp the streets and highways while hunger gnaws at their empty stomachs. Men and women who have lost their courage and fortitude in the depths of despair, yielding up their bodies to a suicide's grave, and then tell us they want to contribute this $250,000,000 to Europe.

Mr. Speaker, I protest.

ELECTION TO A COMMITTEE

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 76

Resolved, That the following Members be, and they are hereby, elected members of the Committee on Invalid Pensions: Mr. JAMES F. FULBRIGHT, of Missouri; Mr. EDWARD A. KELLY of Illinois.

The resolution was agreed to.

MISSISSIPPI'S BIRTHDAY

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a speech delivered by my colleague, Mr. DOXEY, of Mississippi, at the Mississippi Society on the 10th day of the month, being the one hundred and fourteenth anniversary of the entrance of Mississippi into the Union, be extended in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I insert an address by my colleague, Hon. WALL DOXEY, delivered at a meeting of the Mississippi State Society, Washington, D. C., December 11, 1931.

The address is as follows:

Mr. President, fellow Mississippians, and guests: Full well do I realize that there is nothing I can tell you this evening but what you already know about the subject which has been assigned to me. Mississippi's wonderful history is a matter of record, and the lives and biographies of her illustrious men and women are well known to us all. However, at this particular time when we celebrate her birthday, I know our very being thrills with pride and we rejoice in the fact that we are Mississippians.

Considering just how I should discuss the subject with you to-night, I was reminded of an incident that occurred back home.

A negro preacher was taking dinner with Brother Jones. Of course, the minister was the guest of honor, and the best was prepared and served him. After he had eaten bountifully, and was being served for a second time with chicken, he felt he should make some comments to his host, so he said: "Brother Jones, dat's as fine a chicken as I ever eat. Whar did you git it?" "Well now, Parson," replied the carver of the chicken, exhibiting great dignity and seriousness, "when you preaches a special good sermon, I never axes you whar you got it. I hope you will show me de same consideration."

So this evening, as is always characteristic of Mississippians, we must be considerate. I know you will be considerate, and I am going to be considerate by just briefly sketching the period of Mississippi's history prior and immediately subsequent to the time our great State was born into the Union, December 10, 1817, 114 years ago.

We know that every great effect must have its cause. We trace a river like the Mississippi back to the lake from whence it rises. Back of every great thing was once a thought. The story of the prodigal son is the Master's thought of a kind-hearted and wonderful father. Our Declaration of Independence is an expression of our forefathers' thought about liberty. The thought of Hamlet made Shakespeare the prince of dramatists. The thought of Paradise Lost made John Milton the poet. Our great inventors think in terms of steam engines, airplanes, radios, automobiles, ships, and other such inventions that have played and will play such a prominent part in our development and civilization.

This Nation has been made rich, powerful, and may I say, happy, because of the thoughts of our men and women—noble thoughts—wise, altruistic, and beautiful thoughts. Such were the thoughts from whence this Nation sprang.

The thoughts that our forefathers put into our constitutional life, and the laws they made and the lives they lived, are all back of this natal day of our great State of Mississippi.

Our State is a translation into a reality of the beautiful dreams that haunted the souls and minds of those men and women who lived within the borders of our State several generations ago.

In our thoughts we marvel at the fact that Tennyson could take a worthless sheet of paper, write a poem on it, and make it worth thousands of dollars. That is genius. Some men can sign a check and make it worth a million dollars. That is capital. A mechanic can take raw material worth $5 and convert it into the finished product that is worth hundreds of dollars. That is skill. Howard Chandler Christy can take a 50-cent piece of canvas, paint a picture, and it is worth hundreds of dollars. That is art. A merchant can take an article worth 50 cents and sell it for $1. That is business.

But when a group of men can take a vast territory, confronted as they were with such complex and perplexing problems, write a constitution and pass the necessary legislation that causes to shine in that bright galaxy of stars of the States a star that answers to the name of Mississippi, and which for the past 114 years has added luster and brilliancy to the firmament of this Republic—that is a combination of many virtues exemplified in unselfish cooperation and labor.

Let us for a short while ring back the curtain and briefly gaze upon the historic setting of this picture that we are pleased to call "Mississippi." The very name is of Indian origin. "Mississippi" really means, so lexicographers tell us, "beyond age," but it has been generally accepted to mean "Father of Waters." It means "great" as an adjective, "chief" as a noun.

The history of Mississippi as a State began with the Georgia settlement or articles of cession and agreement, which provided "that the Territory thus ceded shall form a State, and be admitted as such into the Union as soon as it shall contain 60,000 free inhabitants, or at an earlier period if Congress shall think it expedient." The census of 1810 showed a population of only 40,000, both free and slave. Nevertheless, the inhabitants were restive under the Territorial status.

In the general assembly of November, 1811, Major Kennedy, of Washington County, introduced a memorial to Congress, which set out in part: "Believing that the people of this Territory are purely American, and of course competent to self-government, we respectfully solicit that the Mississippi Territory, with its present limits, may be admitted into the Federal Union at the present session of Congress, invested with all the rights, privileges, and immunities used and enjoyed by the States of the Union." It was claimed that the immigration was such that the population would be over 60,000 before the organization could be effected; that they were Americans; that the were the legitimate offspring of seventy-six; and that 40,000 were as capable of self-government as 60,000.

But the War of 1812 came on, and the people as well as Congress were so engrossed with this conflict and subsequent developments that it was not until March 31, 1816, that a bill "to enable the Mississippi Territory to form a constitution and State government and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States" was read and debated.

We were fortunate then to have a Territorial Delegate in Congress, as we have been since as a State to have men who were able, sincere, courageous, and dependable to represent and serve the best interests of the people in Congress and who deservedly made for themselves a place in the front ranks among their colleagues in both the House and the Senate.

After much work and discussion the bill was finally passed by both Houses of Congress and the enabling act was signed by President Madison on March 1, 1817.

In pursuance of this enabling act the convention which formed the first constitution of Mississippi met for that purpose on the first Monday in July, 1817, in the old Methodist church in the little town of Washington, Adams County, which housed the first Methodist congregation of all the Southwest. In a recent issue of the Christian Advocate, published at New Orleans, an article appeared telling of an effort now being made to erect a worthy memorial upon the site of this historic old church.

There were giant intellects in this convention who brought renown to themselves, their State, and their Nation. Judge Poindexter was chairman of the committee appointed by the convention to draft the constitution, and to his brilliant but solid legal attainments the State is no doubt largely indebted for her admirable charter. On August 15, 1817, this convention adopted a constitution and adjourned after having been in session 38 days. The fruits of their labors have been and will continue to be a benediction to their posterity.

The State government, based on the constitution formed by this convention, was divided into three departments—the legislative, executive, and judicial. The right of suffrage was granted, with some limitations, to every adult free, white, male citizen of the State, and certain property qualifications were required of office-holders.

The first session of the legislature was directed to be held at Natchez, beginning on the first Monday in October, 1817, and that afterwards it should meet on the first Monday in November in every year, at such place as the law might direct. However, it so happened that on account of an epidemic in the city of Natchez, the first Legislature of the State of Mississippi met in the town of Washington, Adams County, but on December 6, 1817, it met in Natchez.

When the National Congress met in December, a resolution admitting the State thus organized was passed by the House, December 8. The Senate had passed the resolution on December 3, the day before the arrival of an official copy of the constitution. The resolution was signed by President Monroe, December 10, 1817, and Mississippi was born as the twentieth State of the Union.

The State at that time was entitled to only one Representative in Congress. George Poindexter was elected to fill that office, and immediately took the foremost place in Congress as an orator and debater. The new Senators were Walter Leake and Thomas H. Williams.

David Holmes, who was a member of the State convention and helped draft that wonderful document—our State constitution, and who had filled the office of Territorial governor with such ability, was elected first governor of the State of Mississippi.

An act extending the laws of the United States to the new State originated in the House and was adopted by the Senate, March 30, 1818, and was approved April 3, 1818.

On January 5, 1820, George Poindexter was inaugurated the second Governor of Mississippi at Natchez.

On November 28, 1821, the legislature enacted a law authorizing the establishment of a town as a permanent seat of government of the State, calling it "Jackson" in honor of Maj. Gen. Andrew Jackson, who married in Mississippi, and who had so often led the sons of Mississippi to battle and to victory. Mississippi's capital at Jackson is to-day a glowing tribute to the efforts of her pioneer patriots and statesmen who wrought even better than they knew.

Mississippi's past is a halo of glory. Her history is a romance. Her growth is wonderful. The lives and achievements of her sons and daughters border on the miraculous. In spite of great obstacles, she has made wonderful progress.

To-day, I feel I can with modesty say that as a State she is a giant, although it has not been, comparatively speaking, so very long since she wore infant clothes.

When we think of the history and of the noble sons and daughters of our great State a sense of grandeur and a feeling of glory should touch and thrill the heart of every true Mississippian. To be a Mississippian is the embodiment of honor, manhood, and integrity, which are words that should not be lightly used, for they represent lofty ideals, high purposes, and splendid citizenship.

The prevailing sentiment regarding birthdays should be that they are gift days. On this particular birthday we bring no material gifts and lay them in the lap of the State of our nativity, but let us all by our very thoughts, words, and deeds rededicate to Mississippi our loyalty, patriotism, and best efforts, and to her fair name pledge anew our faith, devotion, and deepest concern, and prove ourselves to be worthy of the honor, privilege, and distinction of being Mississippians.

SENATE

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 19, 1931

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, who willest not that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance, give unto us, Thy children, grace, that we may cast away the works of darkness and put upon us the armor of light, for we wrestle not against flesh and blood but against principalities and powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness enthroned in our midst. Raise up, therefore, Thy power and come among us, and with great might succor us, that this Nation may be able to stand strong and steadfast in the face of all adversity, her loins girt about with truth, having on the breastplate of righteousness, her feet shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace—the vesture of Him who at Thy right hand maketh intercession for us. Who then shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation or distress or persecution or famine or nakedness or peril or sword? Nay; in all these things we are more than conquerors through Him that loved us. For we are persuaded that neither death nor life nor angels nor principalities nor powers nor things present nor things to come nor height nor depth nor any other creature shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus, our Lord. Amen.

ECONOMIC CONDITIONS

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article by John P. Frey, in the American Federationist, July, 1931, entitled "The Calamity of Prosperity."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

THE CALAMITY OF PROSPERITY

By John P. Frey, secretary-treasurer, metal trades department, American Federation of Labor

The six years following 1922 were in many respects the most prosperous the United States has experienced. Wealth was created much more rapidly than ever before. Though agriculture did not fare so well, industry, commerce, and banking enjoyed astounding prosperity. The volume and the value of manufactured products increased enormously.

In 1914 the value of our manufactured products was approximately $24,000,000,000. In 1921 it was $44,000,000,000. In 1923 it was $61,000,000,000, while for 1929 it was $69,000,000,000.

It is true that there has been a change in the purchasing power of the dollar between 1914 and 1929, but this change in money value is but a fraction of the difference between the total value of manufactured products in 1914, as compared with those for 1929.

As the great annual increase in the national wealth from 1922 to 1929 was due principally to the wealth created by industry rather than by agriculture, a review of the causes for this increase will assist in a clearer understanding of the principal reason for the depression which began with the fall of 1929.

Unquestionably, agriculture and the wide range of natural resources within continental United States is the foundation upon which our industrial structure is erected. Our country is more self-contained in natural resources than any other. It has a fertile soil and mineral wealth for basic industries which is unparalleled. Coal and oil, iron, copper, and a host of other essential minerals exist in almost unlimited quantity.

These basic advantages have been of utmost value to American industry. In addition to these, and of equally great, if not greater, importance are the methods by which American industry is carried on.

INCREASED PER CAPITA PRODUCTION

It was in the United States that mass production had its origin. It is to this American system of production, made possible through the application of more practical and scientific methods than are to be found elsewhere, that we owe the astounding annual increase in the value of manufactured products during the period under consideration.

New conceptions relative to the methods of manufacturing products began to indicate themselves effectively some 30 years ago. What was termed scientific management began to assert its influence. The chemist, the mechanical, the electrical, and other technically trained engineers began to emerge from the laboratory and enter the workshops for the purpose of directly applying their skill and technical knowledge to every form and method and system of production then in existence.

The mechanic's and the laborer's work was specialized. It was broken down and subdivided, so that each worker performed only a part, and sometimes a most minute one, of the work he had formerly done in connection with production. There was a most rapid development in the invention of automatic and semiautomatic machinery. The use of machinery was greatly increased. The power applied to the operation of machinery per workman was doubled and trebled. Thirty years ago it was less than 2 horsepower per workman in the manufacturing industries. In 1929 this had increased to 5 horsepower per workman.

In addition to the value added by the workmen themselves to the raw material being converted into manufactured goods there was an additional value created by machinery and by the power which operated these machines. It was the development of mass production, with its increasing use of power and machinery and the subdivision of labor, which made it possible for American workmen to produce such an enormous increase in the annual creation of wealth.

Mass production has been accompanied by a most rapid increase in the per capita volume of production in our industries. Federal statistics indicate that during the eight years ending in 1928 over 925,000 workmen were eliminated from our manufacturing industries, some 800,000 from agriculture, and approximately 250,000 from railway transportation. Yet, with this greatly reduced army of workers, manufacturing, agriculture, and railway transportation were of considerably greater volume than seven years before.

It is this constantly increasing production per wage earner which has made labor costs so low in our country. In a number of our industries the labor cost in the United States has been lower than in other countries, although the dollar-and-cent wage has been considerably higher.

The American freight train hauls several thousand tons more than those in other countries. The American agricultural worker, particularly in the wheat fields, sows and harvests the wheat at a considerably lower labor cost per bushel than in those countries where coolie labor receives 9 and 10 cents per day.

The American coal miner, working under the union wage scale, receives a considerably higher dollar-and-cent wage per day than the coal miners of any other country. But the average output per workman in the American coal mines is well over 4½ tons per day, while in England it is but a slight fraction over 1 ton, and in several of the continental countries of Europe less than 1 ton per capita.

The predominance of American industry in the use of machinery is indicated in the following statistics giving the value of the machinery absorbed per year per capita in certain large countries:

In 1913 the United States absorbed $15 per capita in machinery. This amount had risen to $23 in 1925.

In 1913 Great Britain had absorbed $5 per capita in machinery. This had increased to $10 in 1925.

In 1913 Germany had absorbed $7 per capita in machinery. This had increased to $9 in 1925.

In 1913 the machinery absorbed per capita in India amounted to 10 cents. This had increased to 17 cents in 1925.

In China the amount absorbed per capita for machinery in 1913 was 14 cents. In 1925 this was reduced to 5 cents.

In some of our American industries the per capita production since the war has been increased many hundred per cent. Where automatic machinery has almost wholly replaced hand labor, the output per workman has been increased several thousand times. Even in such an industry as agriculture, so our highest authorities inform us, the agricultural worker's output has been increased approximately 300 per cent since 1900.

Volume and value being taken into consideration, it is found that many American workers have been paid a lower dollar-and-cent wage for the volume of their output than the workmen of a number of the other large industrial countries.

NATIONAL CONDITIONS

Although the Nation had contracted a debt of $25,000,000,000 as a result of the World War, the burden apparently placed no check upon the rapid growth of national wealth. The national income increased to such an extent that Americans, while amply financing our industries and commerce, were able to lend some $17,000,000,000 to foreign individuals and foreign countries, in addition to the national loans to the allied nations.

Although a most serious depression has afflicted us for 18 months, our banks contain more money than ever before, and this is being lent on good securities at the lowest rates of interest in our history. There is no famine of money in the bankers' vaults, although industry is seriously depressed and at least 6,000,000 wage earners are wholly unemployed, with a large army of others employed part time.

From the heights of seeming prosperity, which we reached in the forepart of 1929, the country has passed into one of the most serious depressions in its history. Federal statistics indicate that the present recession has reached a lower point below normal than any previous one, even those disastrous depressions of 1857, 1875, and 1894.

It is with the main reason for this depression that we are interested. Unless we can grasp the principal cause and demonstrate it, we can not intelligently proceed to determine the remedy and adopt those policies which must be carried into effect to secure relief and prevent a recurrence of the present industrial tragedy.

Before attempting to indicate the underlying factor, it may be well to mention some of the recognized conditions which have contributed to the world-wide depression existing at present. Among these are changes in the character of international relations; unsuccessful wars or those which have drained a country of its wealth; overwhelming national debts and crushing taxation; a depreciated currency; a lack of national credit; a serious injury to a nation's basic industries; a succession of bad harvests and overspeculation.

None of these causes, or a combination of them, is the principal reason for the depression in our country. Our international relations are normally friendly. We have not engaged in an unsuccessful war or one which drained the country. Our national debt, though large, has not brought about any crushing taxation. Our currency is sound. Our national wealth is intact. We have not had a succession of bad harvests and never before has money been lent at so low a rate on good securities. We are the wealthiest nation of the world.

It is true that there was overspeculation for several years. This did not affect national wealth, but resulted principally in paper loss, fictitious values, which enabled the master manipulators to fleece the unwary, in the same manner that the master gamblers fleece their confiding and less shrewd victims.

The depression came at a time when the production of wealth in the United States had reached a pinnacle never before attained. The foodstuffs grown were greater in volume than ever before; the banks held more wealth. Even now, with stark poverty facing millions of wage earners, we find our grain elevators bursting with wheat and the bankers' vaults congested with money which they are vainly seeking to invest.

THE BACKGROUND

There are most valid reasons for believing that the present depression was caused by the economically unsound policies which governed the captains of industry and finance during the so-called years of prosperity, 1923–1929. It was their incapacity to understand the economic results which must follow the business policies they were carrying out. It was their lack of understanding or their avaricious desire to acquire fabulous wealth in the shortest time possible, or a combination of these, which brought about the calamity of the depression which now presses so destructive a burden upon at least one-fifth of the Nation's wage earners.

If we are to understand more clearly what was transpiring after 1922, it must be kept in mind that our export business never has supplied a market for the great bulk of our industrial production.

Great Britain's wealth was created and developed largely through her export trade in manufactured goods, which has accounted for from 60 to 65 per cent of her production. It is doubtful if our country has ever exported 10 per cent of the Nation's produce, including our agricultural products.

From the days of the Civil War our total exports, including agricultural as well as manufactured products, averaged approximately 7 per cent of the whole. Our export of manufactured goods was increasing to an encouraging extent before the World War, but the enormous national debts incurred by European countries, their dominions and their colonies, led each to build up their manufactures as rapidly as possible. Most of them hoped, in addition to manufacturing for their own home market, to find in an export business the means of securing wealth with which to pay their debts.

The competition of manufactured goods in the world's markets became more keen. One effect of this world-wide condition has been to handicap our Nation's export business, and this handicap has been increased not a little, as far as our manufacturing industries are concerned, by the establishing of American branch plants in foreign countries and the enormous loans made by Americans privately to build up the business of foreign manufacturers.

This in itself is already an important factor in affecting home industry and may become a still greater one in the near future, but it is not our purpose to examine this problem here. Attention has been called to what has transpired industrially in the international field, so that it may become more apparent that the one great market in which the American producer must sell his goods is the home market. It is the breakdown of this home market which has stilled the wheels of industry and created the condition of unemployment which contains such grave elements of danger.

CONDITIONS IN 1922

As our industries recovered from the depression of 1921, there were some outstanding facts with which our captains of industry and finance were familiar. The American system of industrial labor in mass production had firmly established itself. But it was apparent that the full results of the application of power, machinery, and scientific direction of industry had scarcely accomplished more than to open the doors to the still greater efficiency of methods and processes which would be developed.

The chemists, the metallurgists, the technical and production engineers were constantly improving upon the system of production they had established. This led to that constant elimination of workmen, which has been called technological unemployment. Unless new industries, comparable in a way to the development of the automobile, were created, it would be impossible for a large number of workmen, already displaced and to be displaced in the future, to find employment.

It is true that the production of automobiles created new employments and that larger numbers displaced found work in personal service and professional entertainment. It was equally true that a large number of the skilled workers eliminated from the manufacturing industries and railroads had been unable, even when they did secure other employment, to secure wages equal to those formerly received. The skilled worker eliminated even in early middle life, can not acquire the same degree of skill in some new industry which will bring equally high wages.

There existed another well-established condition vitally affecting American industry—the growing difficulty of increasing our export of manufactured goods. Our business leaders had no reason for believing in 1922 that there would be any material increase in the volume of our exports. It was evident to those having control of our industries that approximately 95 per cent of our manufactured goods must be sold in the American market. They were also aware that approximately 80 per cent of our population is composed of wage earners and their dependents.

It did not require exceptional intelligence to realize that the capacity of the American wage earners to purchase what was being produced depended upon their real wage, the purchasing capacity of the dollars and cents in the pay envelope. If industry and commerce should fail to pay wages having a sound relation to the wealth being created, then, in addition to injuring the wage earners, industry and commerce itself would be seriously and perhaps dangerously affected.

It was the failure of our captains of industry and finance to be influenced by the evident economic facts, which created the disastrous injury to the market in which their goods must be sold, and which, more than anything else, brought about the depression which overwhelmed the country in the winter of 1929.

The responsibility for our present condition rests upon many shoulders, but principally upon those who dominate our industries, our commerce, and our banks. This is amply demonstrated by a review of what occurred.

There have been periods when our bankers were able to make their business a most profitable one, but never was there such a gathering of profits as during the years which followed 1922. In December of that year the capital of the banks, members of the Federal reserve, was $1,940,000,000. This capital in 1929 had increased to $2,757,000,000. Their surplus at the end of 1922 was $1,625,000,000. At the close of December, 1929, this had increased to $2,864,000,000. Their undivided profits when 1922 closed were $797,000,000. The undivided profits had increased to $1,086,000,000 at the end of 1929.

This financial record indicates the great increase of capital acquired by the member banks of the Federal reserve, who represent approximately 70 per cent of the Nation's banking. This accumulation of reserves was paralleled by the net addition to their profits, which in 1922 amounted to $299,000,000, and in 1929 reached the huge sum of $556,000,000.

This period of rapidly increasing annual profits was accompanied by equally satisfactory dividends to the holders of the banks' stocks. In 1922 the fortunate holders of these stocks were paid $246,000,000 in dividends. Dividend payments increased from year to year, and in 1929 $408,000,000 were paid in dividend checks. The total deposits in these banks in 1922 were $27,288,000,000; in 1929 they had increased to $38,014,000,000.

Unquestionably the bankers were making hay while the sun shone, but quite possibly they were reaping rich harvests under circumstances which materially and injuriously depleted the soil from which their harvests grew.

During the period following 1922 the annual value of manufactured products increased enormously, but not so rapidly as the bankers' profits. The total value of products manufactured in 1923 was $60,529,000,000. In 1927 our manufacturing industries did better, for the total value for that year was $62,718,000,000. This increase in the total value of manufactured products was eclipsed by the two years which followed; years during which rapidly added impetus was given to the causes which are principally responsible for the present depression. In 1929 the total value of manufactured products mounted to $69,417,000,000.

Keeping in mind the fact that the home market was the one upon which our American manufacturers were forced to depend for the sale of 95 per cent of their products, it is interesting to compare the total volume of wages paid in the manufacturing industries with the value of manufactured products.

In 1923 the total wages were $11,007,000,000. Although the value of manufactured products had increased in 1925 more than $2,000,000,000 above 1923, the total volume of wages in the manufacturing industries that year was less than in 1923, and the same is true for 1927. In 1929 there was an increase, for $11,421,000,000 were paid in wages.

Although the total value of manufactured products was practically $9,000,000,000 more in 1929 than in 1923, the total volume of wages paid in these industries in 1929 was but little more than that paid out in 1923.

Unless there had been an enormous increase in the wealth flowing to the agricultural population and a similar great increase in the purchasing capacity of those employed outside of the manufacturing industries, it is evident that the mass of the people were much less able to purchase what was being produced in the United States in 1929 than they had been in 1923.

While the total volume of wages in the manufacturing industries was but a trifle more in 1929 than in 1922, all wages were less in 1929 than in 1926.

How did the owners of stocks, the captains of industry and finance, fare during this period? In 1922 the total of dividends paid by all corporations was $930,648,000; in 1929 $3,478,000,000 were paid in dividends. Bondholders and the banks fared as well, for all corporations paid $2,469,000,000 as interest in 1922, while in 1929 the interest payments amounted to $7,588,000,000.

The failure of industry and commerce to pay wages in proportion to the wealth being created resulted in a serious depression, or lack of consuming power, in the very market in which the manufacturing industries were compelled to depend for the purchase of 95 per cent of their product.

It is true that our American industries were engaged in turning out producers' as well as consumers' goods, but this fact does not change the economic unbalance which resulted through the failure to pay an economically sound wage.

It would not be difficult and it would be well within the truth and perhaps the proprieties to use descriptive terms and phrases more caustic and deserved in referring to what was done to the Nation's prosperity during these years by the majority of the captains of industry and finance than refer to what occurred as an economically unsound distribution of wealth. The temptation to call a spade a spade, to use crisp, blunt, and expressive Anglo-Saxon terms is almost irresistible under the circumstances. But we refrain, for our present purpose is to submit data which presents an indictment more critical and condemnatory than any use of invective.

THE ACCOMPANYING CHARTS

The data made use of relates to millions and billions of dollars, amounts which are difficult for the mind to grasp. It is easier for the eye to catch the trend of statistics through graphic charts than for the mind to carry the picture mathematically. Charts have been included so that the general trend of economic development from 1922 to 1929 can be readily visualized.

CHART NO. 1. WORKERS' PRODUCING AND BUYING POWER

Index numbers 1899=100

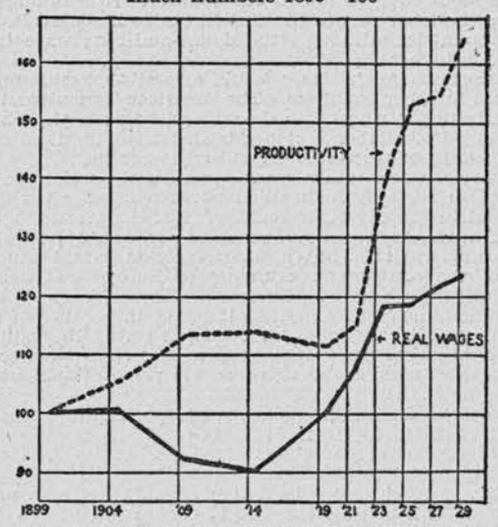

Chart No. 1 covers by index numbers the period from 1899 to 1929. It gives the relationship between the wage earner's increase in productivity and increase in real wage. The critical period discussed in this article began in 1922. A glance at the chart indicates the tremendous rapidity with which productivity increased from that year and the failure of the real wage to increase in proportion.

CHART NO. 2. WAGES AND PRODUCTS OF MANUFACTURING INDUSTRIES

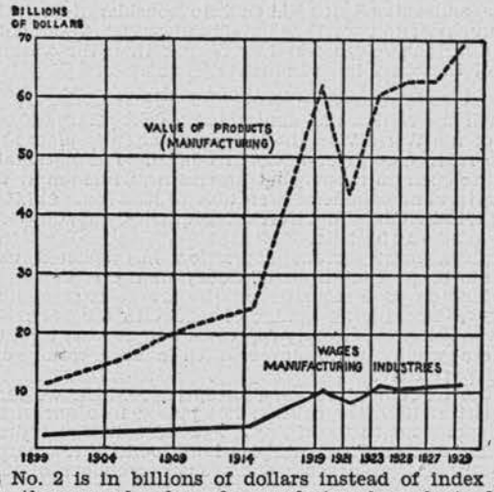

Chart No. 2 is in billions of dollars instead of index numbers. It shows the annual value of manufactured products from 1899 to 1929 and the total volume of dollar-and-cent wages paid in the manufacturing industries. This chart assists in making clear the rapid increase in the annual value of manufactured products and the failure of the dollar-and-cent wage to increase in proportion.

Chart No. 3 covers the period from 1861 to 1929. The solid line shows the advance in the dollar-and-cent wage which began to mount rapidly from 1916. The dotted line indicates the change in the real wage, which, because of the more rapid increase in prices, as the chart indicates, utterly failed to keep pace with the dollar-and-cent wage. The worker's dollar-and-cent wage had a rapidly decreasing purchasing value after 1916.

Chart No. 4 presents the volume of manufactured goods since 1899, and indicates the rapid increase in the volume of manufactured goods produced after 1922. That a comparison may be made, a curve is included which gives the increase in the value of manufactured goods produced so that volume and value are contrasted. A dotted line presents the national growth in population.

Chart No. 5 gives the index number showing profits made and dividends paid by the banks, members of the Federal reserve. A curve at the foot is used to indicate the increase in the national population. This chart indicates the rapid increase in banking profits as a result of increased national production, and presents visual evidence of the bankers' ability from 1922 to 1929 to make hay while the sun shone.

Chart No. 6 is of particular interest, as it presents a visualization of gross and net bank earnings, bank dividends, and the tremendous rapid increase after 1925 of the dividends paid by industry and railway transportation. If there had been any corresponding increase in the dollar-and-cent wage being paid, we would not have been smothered by the depression which now presses down upon us.

The foregoing charts assist to a better understanding of Chart No. 7, which, in billions of dollars, presents the total national income from all sources, the value of manufactured products, and the total volume of wages and salaries paid in the United States. There are many sources of income in addition to manufactured products. There is our agriculture, our mining, our transportation, and other industries. It will be seen that the total income increased more rapidly after 1923 than the value of manufactured products. It will also be seen that, while salaries did not advance as rapidly as wages previous to 1926, that from then on they increased more rapidly due to two factors—the employment of a larger number of salaried employees in proportion to the number of wage earners, coupled with the rapid increase in the salaries paid to executives.

CHART NO. 5. BANK PROFITS AND DIVIDENDS

Millions of dollars Millions of people

The most startling feature of Chart No. 7 is the curve showing the volume of wages for all employees, which includes all wage earners in addition to those employed in the manufacturing industries. Here we find that after increasing slightly from 1925, they remained at the same volume for a year and then after 1927 began to go downward, so that, while the total national income and the total value of manufactured products were rapidly increasing, the total volume of wages paid in the United States actually decreased. It is not surprising that, with this reduced capacity to buy, the mass of the people were unable to purchase the goods from which the investors, the banks, and the captains of industry had been reaping such enormous profits.

Chart No. 7, in conjunction with Chart No. 6, helps to visualize the statement recently made by Dr. Julius Klein, Assistant Secretary of Commerce, that real wages increased 13 per cent from 1921 to 1929, but that during this period the return to industrialists grew 72 per cent, while the gain in dividends on industrials and rails increased 256 per cent.

THE CALAMITY

The outstanding economic facts of the so-called period of prosperity from 1922 to the end of 1929 present a depressing picture of economically unsound and destructive business policy. There is little, if anything, in the basic statistics to encourage or create confidence in the future. It is apparent that during this period the American wage earner was considered almost wholly as a producer of wealth and that he was disregarded as the major consumer of the Nation's products.

In 1922 it was known that we could hope to export little more than 5 per cent of our manufactured products and that the bulk of our manufacturing industries must depend for their market upon the 80 per cent of the population represented by the wage earners and their dependents. Yet a business policy was carried out which could have no other effect than to weaken steadily the consuming market.

There are basically important moral and social questions involved in the just distribution of the annual wealth created, which must be considered in connection with the national welfare, but at present we are attempting to deal only with the economic factors.

The business practices carried out during the period under consideration instead of solidly building up the Nation's prosperity were in reality tearing it down, destroying it, for they were basically unsound.

Many of those who are responsible for the catastrophe because they failed to pay an economically sound wage are now informing the American public that the only hope of recovery is to reduce still further the total amount of wages. They are like the farmer who, believing that his horse was eating too much, gradually reduced the daily ration to the vanishing point, and then remarked to a neighbor, "I had just brought the rations down to the limit when the danged brute laid down and died."

After 1922 the nourishing blood of the national wealth filled the arteries of industry and commerce, but the financial heart instead of pumping it throughout our economic system created congestion. Instead of nourishing the Nation it caused a stoppage, the partial paralysis which we call the depression.

Our captains of industry and finance now find themselves much in the position of Midas, smothered by the hoards of gold they have heaped up. If they alone were the present sufferers because of their economic shortsightedness, there would be a large measure of justice in their situation; but their fatal economic policies have wrought havoc and spread suffering to millions of American wage earners and their dependents.

The period from 1922 was marked by the extension of combinations in finance, industry, and commerce. Mergers, trusts, and holding corporations not only increased rapidly in number but in their wide control. Certainly the period was not one in which sound economic policies guided those in control of the Nation's activities. What occurred bears much more resemblance to the law of the jungle than to the sane management of business by those responsible for its development.

The Nation fervently desires a return to prosperity, but if the improvement, which must come one of these days, is to be featured by the same unsound distribution of wealth which prevailed after 1922, then instead of prosperity we will be entering into another period during which the seeds of future business catastrophe will be sown.

The evidence that those in control of our industry, commerce, and finance are largely responsible for the present depression is overwhelming. The great majority of the leaders, informed as they are, could not avoid the knowledge that the economically unsound distribution of wealth for which they were responsible must result in industrial depression and disaster.

These business leaders had outstanding economists to supply them with information. They were organized and federated together as business men had never been before. They had at their command larger staffs of technically trained men than during any previous period; yet, with all of their knowledge and powerful organizations with their far-reaching influence, they created the economic condition which brought about the depression.

We will not refer to the many alleged reasons they have given for the depression. Some of these are absurd, a few partly true, but all of them carefully avoid reference to the principal cause—the payment of wages so completely out of economic relationship with the wealth being created that these wages actually forced continually lessened sales of manufactured goods in the United States, the one great market for American products.

The statistics presented in this article are a sufficient criticism and reply to all of the alleged reasons, which so many business leaders have been advancing during the year.

The maldistribution of wealth, so manifest from 1922, with the depression which this created, is an evidence that the leaders of American business proved unqualified to be trusted with the unregulated and uncontrolled management of the Nation's industry and commerce, for among other things, assurance of employment had been destroyed.

Earthquakes, floods, and droughts are unpreventable acts of nature for which business men and public officials are not responsible. If they were, there would immediately follow some drastic disciplinary changes. But the existing depression is not due to any acts of nature, it was caused by the failure of those in control of affairs to be governed by sound economic policies, due to their shortsightedness, indifference, and lust for profits.

It is men and not acts of nature which control our economic development. Men are responsible for failure or success. In view of the economic record from 1922, it is evident that those responsible for the direction of industry and commerce must be prevented from again wrecking the mechanism of prosperity if this is humanly possible.

The Nation is at least as interested in the welfare of the mass of the people as it is in the opportunities which may be presented to a few to accumulate millions and billions of dollars. The Nation's economic welfare requires that labor be given a greater voice in the direction of industry and in determining the terms of employment and conditions of labor than it has had in the past.

As wage earners we have a serious concern with the health of industry and commerce. Under the existing industrial system it is through employment as wage earners that the mass of the people must secure their livelihood.

To protect themselves from the exploitation which developed so rapidly after 1922, wage earners must be organized in larger numbers and be made to understand better the part which they must play as citizens and as producers in the Nation's activities.

There must be a larger degree of cooperation between management and labor. This cooperation can not function satisfactorily unless labor is organized, and then insists upon its right to a voice in the conduct of industry in so far as labor is affected. Unfortunately instead of being stimulated cooperation and collective bargaining have been repressed as much as possible by the very men whose unsound business policies resulted in such a disastrous maldistribution of national wealth.

Unless we are to permit the law of the jungle to operate, there are two principal methods to be applied to prevent a recurrence of the catastrophe from which we are now suffering. One is to attempt to regulate business through legislation, a method which, if experience is a safe guide, proves cumbersome and inadequate as well as unsatisfactory. The other is to establish a much larger degree of practical cooperation between those directing the Nation's activities and the wage earners.

Those in control of our industries have certain obligations which they can not set aside without incurring penalties. The manifest duty of industry, as was pointed out at the Portland convention of the American Federation of Labor in 1923, is to correct the maladjustments.

The privilege of carrying on business in the United States carries with it obligations which business can not avoid without injury to itself. Should industry fail to adjust its policies so that future depressions due to the uneconomic distribution of wealth can be prevented, should industry refuse to meet the organized wage earners' chosen representatives for the purpose of establishing thoroughgoing cooperation, then it will not be surprising if the American people insist upon the legislative method.

American wage earners and the American people as a whole are not so indifferent or so stupid as to continue to stand idly by while those in high places permit and carry out economic policies so unsound as to wreck the mechanisms through which the Nation's wealth is created.

Rugged individualism as applied by so many American business men since 1922 can not be permitted to operate in the future as it has in the past. In too many instances rugged individualism has degenerated into ruthless exploitation. Rugged individualism must learn to control itself wisely or the people will be fully justified in regulating it to the interest of the mass instead of the individual.

THE NATIONAL BUDGET

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I have a letter from Mr. J. W. Oliver, of the Linen Thread Co., of New York City, with reference to the National Budget and legislation relating thereto, which I ask unanimous consent may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

THE LINEN THREAD COMPANY,
New York, December 18, 1931.

Senator W. WARREN BARBOUR,
Room 147, United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR BARBOUR: No doubt you have already been flooded with letters regarding the National Budget as presented by the Secretary of the Treasury. I am writing you personally to express my views on this, and I am likewise going to my own Congresman.

The Treasury Department has grouped expenditures under the following four main divisions:

First. Public debt, Army, Navy, and veterans.
Second. Legislative, executive, and judicial departments.
Third. Aids to industry, public works, etc.
Fourth. Tax refunds and miscellaneous.

Taking only groups two and three, the expenditures by fiscal years are as follows:

Year	Group 2	Group 3
1929	$360,373,058.24	$485,407,687.74
1930	313,399,290.41	711,489,620.75
1931	371,684,236.01	946,694,801.13
1932	432,355,850.00	1,065,128,250.00
1933	386,819,400.00	722,160,250.00

Even without considering the decrease in the average price of commodities, the increase between 1929 (a boom year) and 1933 is tremendous. Using an average price decline of, say, 12 per cent accentuates the comparison, making it all the more odious.

I know that you must look on these matters from the viewpoint of the business man; hence, I believe you will agree with me that the Federal departments should be no exception to the rule of contraction in difficult times. With all incomes reduced, the increase in Federal expenditures makes the proportionate burden enormously greater.

You will be interested to know that when I attended the national tax conference in Atlanta this fall I found an almost universal feeling that it was not the time to look for new sources of revenue for governmental expenditure, but that the only way to afford relief was to cut Government expenses. Several years ago the Federal department took this attitude, but the State and local governments continued their program of increased expenditure and correspondingly higher taxes on personal incomes as well as business.

The trend of the times to-day indicates that we are in for a long pull of low-price levels, and the average employee is told, when his salary is reduced, that living expenses are coming down so that his burden should not be as great as it appears. So far as groceries and foodstuffs are concerned, this is true; but with rents, taxes, insurance, and interest payments little, if any, relief has been felt and with regard to taxes, the reverse has been the situation. However, the employer is not to blame for this, and he must tell the employee that the burden of forcing these reductions falls upon those receiving the decreased incomes. In other words, the mass of employees must rise and protest against increased taxes, must protest to the landlord, and effect the necessary changes that will enable them to live on smaller incomes. This is exactly what we have had to tell our employees here, and it is precisely what the large banking institutions are telling their employees.

The Treasury Department estimates the current deficit at $2,000,000,000 and the deficit for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1932, at $1,700,000,000. If foreign governments fail to meet payments on time, or if any other surprises of an unfavorable character appear, the deficit will, of course, be larger. In planning a scale of expenditures which involves deficits for two years or more and bond issues of at least $3,000,000,000, the United States Government will be setting the worst sort of example not only to other governments but to corporations and individuals as well. I believe the least they should do is to make an effort to balance the Budget and leave borrowing available in the event that, due to unforeseen circumstances, actual revenue is less than actual receipts.

With respect to revenue legislation, I believe that making income-tax rates retroactive for a year is a vicious proposal. Business and personal affairs may not be conducted with any confidence unless there is a certain knowledge of the tax levies to be made against income currently realized. The increased rates, and larger ones if necessary, should be made effective from January 1, 1932, only. As far as reducing personal exemptions is concerned, I can see nothing but politics in the opposition to the Treasury plan. Certainly the man with the smaller income should bear his proportion of the burden, and the only way this can be brought about is by a reduction in personal exemptions. However, if the new revenue act is passed with lower personal exemptions, as I think it should be, these should go into effect on January 1, 1932, thus leaving the employee who has had to struggle along the best he could this year to pay no more taxes than is required by the law now in effect. In other words, if a considerable reduction in my own personal exemptions is made effective, I feel that it should not go into effect until next year, so I can plan my own personal budget accordingly. If it is made retroactive from the first of this year, it will mean that my tax burden will be much higher next year, and in the meantime the year is practically over and I have had no warning until the current proposal of a change in the revenue act was published to budget my own expenditures in a way that would permit me to accumulate the necessary money to pay the taxes next March 15.

There is on old saying that two things are certain; namely, death and taxes. However, in the past the amount of the tax burden has been quite uncertain and has been a disturbing factor due to its uncertainty.

I hope you will take this as an appeal from a citizen.

Kindest personal regards.

Very truly yours,

J. W. OLIVER.

THE ECONOMIC DEPRESSION

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, following a speech delivered by me in the closing days of the last session outlining what I believed to be some of the chief causes of the economic depression in this country, I received many comments from various groups and individuals who were deeply interested in this subject.

The speech to which I refer put large responsibility for our present previous difficulties upon the orgy of speculation and the prodigious inflation of values which the country witnessed during the years immediately preceding the 1929 stock-market crash.

I have recently received from two prominent citizens of my State illuminating statements in which they enunciate in part the views to which I have given utterance and in which they suggest various remedies. I consider them a real contribution to the solution of the pressing economic problems with which we are confronted.

One statement is by Bernard J. Rothwell, a prominent and successful merchant of Boston. The other is by George W. Anderson, a retired justice of the United States circuit court at Boston.

I ask that both of these statements, which I ask to be treated in the nature of petitions, be referred to the Committee on Finance and be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statements were referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEMORANDUM REGARDING EXISTING DEPRESSION

By Bernard J. Rothwell, of Boston

Setting aside foreign complications, political and economic, and the disastrous decline in commodity prices, big business—frequently beyond human capacity to properly administer—high finance, and almost universal wild speculation, all of which ran riot in 1921–1929, inclusive, are generally conceded to have been responsible for the crash of the latter year and for the deplorable conditions which have since resulted.

The signs of social discontent and of political unrest which have been manifest the past two years, not merely in our own country but throughout the world, need no enumeration. In practically all cases they have had an economic basis.

That basis is the failure of the capitalistic system—or, as termed by President Nicholas Murray Butler, the liberal system—to provide not merely against recurring periods of deceptive prosperity and extreme depression but to protect the masses from the enormous displacement of man power in industry, resulting from the introduction of high-speed, mass-production machinery and the ever-increasing application of science and invention.

The consequent overproduction has led to ruinous prices—far below cost—of every product of soil and mine all over the world, including copper, silver, oil, cotton, wheat, and other grains, potatoes, sugar, rubber, etc., and has correspondingly reduced employment and paralyzed the purchasing power of all engaged in those industries and their dependents.

To these may be added many other contributing causes, among them the development of enormous manufacturing and distributing corporations, the latter exercising the profit-destructive power of concentrated volume buying; high-pressure selling methods, whereby "desires" were proclaimed to be "necessities," thrift and provision for the inevitable "rainy day" declared to be both unwise and unwarranted; a philosophy of practically perpetual prosperity being proclaimed by men in high authority.

This abandonment of reasonable prudence was largely encouraged by the banking interests in freely furnishing ample funds to all classes of borrowers, often without adequate inquiry as to the soundness of the proposition or the fitness of the parties undertaking it.

They also encouraged overbuilding of industrial plants, commercial structures, etc., mergers, consolidations, unwarranted and injudicious increase of capital structures based on refunding upon a low-return basis the extraordinary profits of abnormal years. In many of these they participated in promotions and underwritings.

The securities thus underwritten being, in due course, allotted to smaller corresponding banks throughout the country, resulted in loading them with frozen assets, most of which could only be marketed at severe losses, some not at all.

Hosts of wage earners were lured into incurring debts, the payment of which depended solely upon maintenance of the then current, uncertain family income.

The victims of these circumstances noted: The steady increase of vast aggregations of capital, many of them affiliated.

Splitting up of stocks two, three, or more shares for one; the distribution of stock dividends and the increase of total dividend payments on such multiplications.

The extensive development of holding companies upon an enormous scale; the control—secured usually at exorbitant prices—of great numbers of public utilities by these holding companies and the floating of stock to the public largely in excess of even these unwarranted prices.

The consequent charge of excessive rates to the consumer, based upon earnings providing attractive dividends upon these fictitious valuations.

The recapitalization of such companies upon a gigantic scale, based upon phenomenal and entirely abnormal earnings, figured down to a 5 per cent, 6 per cent, or even lower basis.

The unequal distribution of the abnormal profits of the several years preceding the crash of 1929, these earnings resulting from either unwarrantably higher prices than should have been charged the consumer or lower wages than should have been paid the workers.

The failure to allot a liberal share of these earnings to reserves for the inevitable reaction, with its consequent disastrous unemployment.

The steady, forced appreciation in market value of these depreciated shares based on assumed future prospects and the effort to earn and pay increasing dividends thereon.

The age "dead line" whereby great numbers, at what should be their most productive period, are virtually excluded from employment.

The piling up of great wealth by professional speculators, nonproducers, and their ostentatious parade of extravagance in the face of contemporaneous misery.

Well-nigh universal speculation, pervading every element of society, young and old—porter and preacher, bell boy and bishop, men, women, and adolescents.

The unwillingness of the authorities of the principal stock and commodity exchanges to curb pool operations, frequently amounting in single transactions to 10,000, 50,000, and even 100,000 shares, as well as the abuse of selling "short," with its inevitable effect of demoralizing values and accentuating prevailing depression.

The too frequent defalcation of trusted fiduciary officials—executive and subordinate—almost invariably traceable to speculation in stock or commodity markets, these defalcations sometimes running into hundreds of thousands, and even millions, before being detected.

The enormous gambling in grain, foodstuffs, and other staple commodities, daily transactions in wheat in Chicago alone running as high as 75,000,000 to 100,000,000 bushels in a single session; in one session running over 150,000,000 bushels. The equivalent of the entire wheat crop of the United States being sold in that one market in different years from fifteen to twenty-seven times, whereas Government records over an extended period show hedging constituted only 5 per cent of the total transactions in wheat in that market, 95 per cent being purely speculative.

It is obvious that such conditions as now exist can not long continue without political and social disturbances of the most serious character.

Unless some drastic change is made in policies which have permitted the excesses mentioned, any marked improvement in existing conditions would have no assurance of permanency. Many men of good judgment predict it would be relatively short lived and would be followed by an even more serious situation than that which now confronts us.

The trouble goes deeper than what appears to be fundamental; it threatens the foundations of the capitalistic system because of its abuses. These latter should preferably be abolished by voluntary, concerted action of industrial and financial leaders rather than by legal process. (See address of President Nicholas Murray Butler, The One and the Many, delivered at Southampton, Long Island, in August, 1930.)

Organized business has constantly maintained that it should be left free to cure its own evils and defects; but during two years of extreme distress and in face of widespread, continuous criticism of its failures, it has neglected to take a single constructive step to remedy conditions. Under these circumstances it is apparent that reforms will be effected only through wise and thoughtful action by the Government itself.

There is likewise increasing dissatisfaction regarding parliamentary government, its tardiness in responding to public sentiment, its waste of time in long-drawn-out discussion, the handicap of senatorial veto and of senatorial and congressional courtesies, vote swapping, logrolling, etc., and, in general, the subserviency to corporate influence and interest.

That essential correctives should be formulated, adopted, and put forward for general adoption by a group of the recognized leaders of industry, finance, labor, economics, and the public is highly important.

This group should devote itself unremittingly and continuously until it can recommend such changes as would tend to weaken communistic propaganda and discourage communistic action.

While the depression now current is world-wide and is based to a large extent upon the same fundamentals, it would be a fatal blunder were the causes responsible for conditions in the United States to be ignored or were the controlling forces to maintain a Bourbon-like attitude—"After us the deluge."

It appears as though among other correctives there will have to be an "unscrambling of the eggs"; that the capital structure of many industries will have to be reorganized by a reversal of the process of the twenties and the issue of 1 share for 2, 3, or more where the increased stock issues of that period did not represent additional capital paid in by the stockholders.

This would result in important economies, would obviate the necessity of undertaking to earn dividends on very many millions of shares of outstanding stock, would permit a proportion of profits to be devoted to the establishment of unemployment or age-retirement reserves, would give stockholders some conception of what proportion of the property their shares really represent, and would lessen the dissatisfaction with which employees now regard the fictitious capital structures which have been erected and the declaration of dividends thereon.

The following suggestions for legislation affecting our international relations and for modification of our present economic structure are by no means complete. These latter are not put forward in any dogmatic spirit, but for open-minded consideration from the viewpoint of the public welfare rather than that of special interest or privilege.

First in order would be world peace. Acceptance by the United States Senate of the protocols now before it, which would constitute membership of the United States in the World Court, is of the highest importance. The recent action of the United States in joining with the Council of the League of Nations in action regarding the Chinese-Japanese conflict clearly indicates that we can no longer isolate ourselves from international affairs. Our entrance into the World Court would no doubt be the strongest possible support to the Kellogg-Briand pact for the settlement of international disputes.

Disarmament. This, naturally, follows upon the foregoing. So long as the United States withholds its adherence to the World Court for the settlement of all international disputes its position in the Kellogg-Briand pact is entirely contradictory and jeopardizes international confidence in our sincerety.

Elimination of unfair and dishonorable competition through modification of the Sherman and Clayton Acts.

Restraint of excessive profits by publicly owned corporations as disclosed through analysis of income-tax returns.

Deflation of corporate capital structure excessively inflated through stock dividends, splitting of shares, etc.

Holding companies to be under jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Rearrangement of capital structure of publicly owned and traded corporations by capitalizing abnormal earnings upon a low-return basis, splitting of shares, etc., to be subject to approval by Federal or State authorities.

Limitation of dividends upon corporate capital employed in public-utility corporations vested with monopolistic privileges, to money actually paid in plus reasonable additions to surplus, charges to be as low as provision for unemployment and pension reserves and equitable return to stockholders will permit, such reserves to be an operating expense, free of taxation.

Same general rules to apply to all companies whose securities are regularly listed upon stock or commodity markets and whose securities are held by the public. Similar unemployment and pension reserves to be established by all employers of 20 or more persons.

Elimination of all trading on margins in stock exchanges and commodity-market "futures," and between brokers and their customers; all transactions to be for cash, necessary accommodation, whether for speculation or investment, being secured from banks; speculative selling "short" in stock or commodity markets to be prohibited. This not to interfere with legitimate hedging.

Lending to "short" sellers stocks bought and held for customers' account to be prohibited.

Trading for their own account by houses soliciting or accepting orders from the public generally to be prohibited.

Suppression of speculative pools and trading in blocks of shares so large as to afford prima facie evidence of not being the result of legitimate supply and demand.

National and State banks to be restricted to their primary function of loaning, investing, and safeguarding deposits, and to be barred from participation in promotions and underwritings. Trust companies to be similarly restricted as to promotions and underwritings.

Preservation of equal individual opportunity, with freedom to determine occupation unrestricted by either Government or group dictation.

Abolish the "dead line"—40 or thereabouts—in hiring and firing employees.

Work to be "staggered" in time of slack business according to necessities of each individual case. Should reduction of number of days, or hours of daily employment be determined, wage or salary to be the proportional part of 6-day, 8-hour scale.

No dole system. Payment to be made only for work done, except in case of physical incapacity.

We are now confronted with problems of the greatest gravity. They must be faced and solved if the existing political, economic, and social system of these United States is to be preserved.

A FEW OBSERVATIONS ON OUR AMERICAN SYSTEM

By George W. Anderson, of Boston

The main purpose of this writing is analysis and description only. No 5-year plan, no 20-year plan, or other cure for our present economic and financal ills is here suggested. This is merely a record of observations on our American system.

For 50 years of adult life I have observed and studied American institutions. Recurrent periods of business depression and business prosperity have marked the whole half century. Our fatalistic economists call these cyclical and inevitable. The present depression has many similarities to prior depressions. I think I observe some possibly significant differences.

I. There is a lack of the general optimism characteristic of the earlier hard times, more conceded bewilderment over both causes and prospects. Many thoughtful people are seriously questioning whether profit seeking, as a dominant force, grounds a just or worth-while civilization. There is more intelligent doubt of the soundness of capitalism, more doubt of the value of competition and the antitrust acts, less faith (perhaps less desire) of success in the fight against big business.

II. There is no general acceptance of the old panacea for most business troubles—reduction of wages. Rather is there a considerable recognition of the fact that only by increasing the purchasing power of the mass of wage earners can any adequate market be made for our large surplus output in every line. This is a new business phenomenon initiated by Henry Ford about 12 years ago. Large production without markets is found fruitless. We have superabundance of food, clothing, fuel, transportation facilities, metals, machinery, everything needed for wholesome human living, but not brains enough to distribute and use them. Our American system is producing ragged bread lines and unmarketable clothing and foodstuffs, a ghastly contrast.

III. No one can conceive of any intelligent man now doing what Andrew Carnegie did in 1886—writing a book and entitling it "Triumphant Democracy." No one now regards democracy as "triumphant," or even successful, in an economic sense. In fact, our American democracy is little less than an unwholesome myth; economically considered, it is a wretched failure. With over 500 individual incomes exceeding a million dollars and 26 exceeding $5,000,000, we have at least 6,000,000 of industrial unemployed, reducing probably 25,000,000 of our citizens to dire poverty, many of them to actual suffering. We must still have 30,000,000 to 40,000,000 people living on our farms; only with optimism can one regard 10 per cent of them as really prosperous. Many of the farmers are badly in debt, and are selling their products at much less than the fair cost of production. "The abolition of poverty" is not a shining success.

Turning to ownership, it is commonly accepted that about 4 per cent of our people own 80 per cent of the country's property. Moreover, comparative analysis of the income-tax returns for a period of years (too lengthy and involved for present statement) seems to show a steady drift toward an increasing concentration both of property and income. Our tendency and achievement, economically considered, are plainly antidemocratic.

It may safely be assumed that equality, either in property or in income, is neither possible nor desirable. But such gross inequality as we now have (and increasingly) is, as Mr. R. H. Tawney has pointed out, "a matter of quality of life." Poverty means narrow, pinched lives, unsanitary physical conditions, high infantile mortality, and lack of economic security. It takes out most of the joy of life. A permanently poor man is rarely self-respecting.

Conceivably political control, through universal suffrage, may yet be transmuted into control of economic tendency. If so, American democracy will not then be accurately characterized as "an unwholesome myth." Whether this arguable potentiality of political control of economic forces can be so used as to stem the present tide toward greater and greater inequality in property holdings and in incomes is a fair question for solution by such a collection of our very best minds as the United States Chamber of Commerce. If incapable of solution by that body of our very best minds, the characterization may probably stand as true.

Compare the property holdings and incomes in our modern society with like items under the feudal system, when the great bulk of property consisted of land and its rather meager appurtenances. Of course, the whole product now is much larger than in medieval times. But it may well be questioned whether the inequality, both in property holding and in current income, is not relatively as great now as under the feudal system. We have simply substituted modern methods of appropriation of property and absorption of income for the class and feudal methods.

Such democracy as we have had for two generations has been, in the main, grounded on the homestead act of 1862. Under this act settlers were enabled to get at small cost 160 acres of fertile public land. This resulted in millions of independent farmers establishing wholesome homes in the Mississippi Valley. They were the backbone of our democracy. But the machine age has doomed the small, independent farmer, as it long ago doomed the home weavers in our New England farmhouses. Our drift for several decades has been urban and industrial.

The sources of our excessively large fortunes and incomes are mainly:

(1) Urban land values and ground rents, all unearned, socially created.

(2) Subsurface deposits of minerals and metals, also unearned, the rightful property of the whole people.

(3) Profits derived from corporation manipulations, various forms of stock waterings, largely in public utilities (privately owned monopolies), the rates of which are, in essence, taxes. This source probably grounds more unearned incomes and property than the first two sources.

(4) Inheritances, which tend to perpetuate and increase the inequalities, mostly originally derived from one or all of the first three sources.

Urban and subsurface values in land may be buttressed under our Constitutions, Federal and State. Doubtless by taxation a partial recognition of the public right therein might be secured. Corporations and inheritances are plainly subject to legislative change.

I. For land permanently destined to agricultural uses, a fee title to surface rights would plainly be the soundest public policy, if the occupants were, generally, the owners. The great increase in tenant farmers and a rack-renting system comparable to that so long prevailing in Ireland (under which the landlord charged his improving tenant rent on the tenant's own improvements) put this policy in serious question. But the chief defect in this policy is that farming land does not always and everywhere remain farming land. Manhattan Island was once a farming community; when it became a great merchandising and financial city the heirs and grantees of the original landowners acquired huge, unearned, fortunes (like the Astors), all created by the teeming population and their customers. Except in degree this result in New York City is typical of the situation in the whole Nation, now become predominantly urban. Consequential high rents are a substantial contributing cause to the present grossly excessive cost of retail distribution. Henry George a half century ago showed the inevitable results of this theory and propounded his remedy in Progress and Poverty. No effective step has been taken toward asserting the irrefutable public rights to the socially created, unearned, increment in urban lands. Neither the single tax nor any other remedy has been adopted. We resolutely refuse to "render unto Caesar the things that belong to Caesar."

II. Private ownership of subsurface minerals and metals grounded the Rockefeller billionaire fortune, now benevolently, perhaps beneficently, administered by the younger Rockefeller. It also gave us the coal and iron police of Pennsylvania, the inhuman labor conditions in the West Virginia coal fields, and a horde of steel, copper, oil, etc., multimillionaires, many of them highly undesirable citizens. Witness Teapot Dome.

III. Some aspects of corporation manipulation, particularly by our investment bankers, were dealt with by Mr. Louis D. Brandeis (now Mr. Justice Brandeis) 17 years ago in his book entitled "Other People's Money and How the Bankers Use It." All the evils that he there so brilliantly portrayed are, I think, yet in full force and operation. The amounts of money involved are now larger. The code of business ethics is no better; it may be worse. The same system of bankers trading, in effect, with themselves, to the detriment of other people's money, is now fully operative. The attempt to break the "money trust" by prohibiting certain sorts of interlocking directorates has been ineffective.

The Pujo report and the Stanley report, from both of which Mr. Brandeis made many pertinent quotations, and his cogent exposure of the predatory exploitations of our dominant banking groups (not to mention the other innumerable comparable exposures) have, as I think, produced no reform whatsoever.

Bonuses running as high as a million dollars a year to a single executive seem a new device for enriching the insiders at the expense of the powerless small investors in some of our great corporations. Management, of course, is highly important; but not so important as a new machine or process which may greatly increase output or a market for the product, or both. How any of the managers of the Bethlehem Steel Co. can be worth a million, either to their company or to society as a whole, it is impossible to understand. A million a year is about five hundred times the wage of a skilled worker. Is there any such chasm between the fair value of the useful activities of manager and of skilled worker? Or is the bonus system simply another illustration of the gross abuse of financial and corporate power?

The history of the last four years puts in fair question the value of our present leadership in business, economics, banking, and Government. The first two years were marked by a wild and senseless gambling craze—as groundless as the Mississippi bubble—encouraged, even instigated, from high official sources.

The last two years have shown an inevitable reaction, with a bewildered and helpless confusion in all quarters never equaled within the memory of man.

Is any one of our leaders worth $50,000 (more than double the pay of a Supreme Court justice), not to say $100,000 or $150,000, a year as leader? Yet such are the salaries paid by our railroad companies and other public utilities, whose rates are essentially taxes, and which are now seeking to impose higher rates on our impecunious and bankrupt farmers. Testing the leaders of our American system by the results they have achieved, it is plain they are not worth what they are charging us.

Turning to our corporation system, we have 48 States competing for corporation charter fees. Most of them are imitating the New Jersey laws of James B. Dill's day. The quest of these competing sovereignties is to furnish such corporation charters as will facilitate the maneuvers and manipulations of our exploiting classes, particularly our investment bankers. The result is a corporation system probably the worst in the world. The stockholder owners of our huge corporations have been bereft of all power of effective control. Only resort to the courts in cases of glaring frauds remains as a remedy for the victims. It is rarely effective.

Obviously, practically all of these State-chartered corporations have their main activities in the field of interstate commerce. A remedy for the worst of their excesses is not far to seek. Speaking from an unverified memory, it was some 20 years ago that President William H. Taft advocated providing for Federal corporations to be given full control of interstate, and probably foreign, corporate transactions. Plainly, a sound Federal business corporation law would go far toward limiting the present abuses.

Another suggestion possibly worth consideration is that the American Bar Association might prepare and recommend the adoption of a uniform State business corporation law. That association has already done useful work in preparing and securing the adoption by most of our States of the uniform sales act and the uniform negotiable instrument act.

The most important feature of a sound and honest corporation law may be stated in two words—limited liability. A chartered corporation should not exist for the purpose of creating fictitious values or for controlling, irresponsibly, other people's property, much less for acquiring without consideration other people's money. The wholesome and proper function of a corporation charter is to enable investment, without personal liability, beyond the actual amount invested. And the investors (stockholders) should have ultimate controlling power by votes, not be disfranchised as they generally now are by various devices.

The performances of the holding company are now a much-discussed public question. The real trouble with the holding company in the field of public utilities is not that it holds; that function is merely a means of providing (frequently desirable) cooperation or consolidation between interstate public-utility companies. The essential evil of the holding company is security watering. The users of the holding-company device have never been able to resist the temptation to issue more securities than the amount of the original investment in the subsidiaries, or even of the value of the properties thus held and controlled. They pad the rate base and sell the padding to the investing public. That is the gist of the present fight against the power companies, not government ownership or operation.

The fundamental question is not whether a government bureaucracy is more or less inefficient than a corporation bureaucracy. Both are bureaucracies—with all the implications of that word. My experience with government bureaucracies has given me a fairly high opinion of their inefficiency. Witness the performance as to our new Federal building in Boston. But one of the wisest and most experienced business men of my acquaintance tells me that the main distinction between a corporation bureaucracy and a government bureaucracy is that the mistakes of the government bureaucracy are generally exposed and publicly known, whereas in the corporation bureaucracy they are, generally, concealed, and thus unknown; that one is no more efficient than the other. This may be so.

Parenthetically, comparison of the history of the building and management of our rail highways with our experience of the last generation in building a great system of motor roads leaves no doubt that the latter job has been, on the whole, the better and more economical of the two. Built by the States, with some Federal help, in part out of bond issues, but largely out of gasoline taxes, the history of the construction of the motor roads compares favorably with that of the railroads.

But the motor service by three to five times, unneeded, competing, gasoline stations, is as wasteful and uneconomic as the building of thousands of miles (now unremunerative) of unneeded, competitive rail highways, largely in the eighties. Plainly, in some kinds of industry, competition costs more than it is worth. Certainly it does in all public utilities—natural monopolies.

IV. Recognition that the family is the unit of a sound civilized society underlies our laws of inheritance. Some of our States carry this recognition so far as to impose substantial limitations on the statutory right of testamentary disposition. Graduated inheritance taxes are our main reliance for asserting dominant social right in the accumulations of our excessively acquisitive decedents. It ought to be applied more generally and drastically—not abolished, as some of our leading bankers and public officials have recently urged. Few would advocate entire abolition of the right to inherit property.

A fundamental principle—the slogan—of our present ruling classes is "no government in business." They carry this even to the extent of epithetical denunciation of government ownership and operation, or even effective regulation of such natural monopolies as railroad, telegraph, power companies, etc. They are not content with applying this doctrine to the great mass of productive industries in which competition is supposed to furnish incentive for progress as well as prevention of extortionate prices—a theory which our "big business men" are constantly seeking to nullify by combinations in restraint of trade—so-called trusts. Indeed, there is at present a strong agitation for repeal of the antitrust acts, thus giving big business a free hand to combine, control, and extort at will. Such are the outstanding phenomena of our present capitalistic régime.

Curiously and inconsistently, we have the spectacle of the Federal Government, in utter disregard of constitutional limitations, going "into business," through the Farm Board and expending hundreds of millions of dollars in the purchase of wheat and cotton. A cruder, more unintelligent, sporadic form of socialism can not be imagined. To stabilize the wheat market is a far more difficult task than to stabilize the coffee, sugar, or rubber market. Wheat is grown in larger and more widespread portions of the earth than either coffee, sugar, or rubber. Its market is a world market, centered in Liverpool. But for obvious political reasons, the present administration abandoned its fundamental and much-vaunted theory of "no business by government," in order to cater to a supposedly important part of our electorate. The only achievements so far have been: (1) To lose large sums of taxpayers' money, which might have been much better used for other purposes; and (2) to increase the already excessive production of wheat and cotton by inciting to more extensive planting.

But this is but one of innumerable illustrations of our chaotic and planless civilization. State socialism, if a feasible and desirable substitute for our present chaos, must be grounded on some intelligent and logical coordination of productive facilities with markets—consumption. It must have regard to fundamental, public right, in natural resources, like, as already noted, subsurface minerals and metals and urban rights in land, as well as natural monopolies, like railroads, power companies, and other public utilities.

A great experiment of this sort is apparently now being carried on in Russia. Its results are being watched with great interest by most of our intelligent classes—with great fear by the subservient, highly vocal organs of our present chaotic and planless, capitalistic system. It is clear enough that the oligarchy now making this experiment in Russia, faces enormous and perhaps insuperable difficulties in giving their controlling theories a fair trial. With a huge and largely illiterate population—spread over an area larger than the entire United States, and made up of many races, speaking many languages or dialects—the experiment of state socialism would seem, superficially, impossible of success. But, so far as one can now ascertain the facts, this experiment is now no more unsuccessful, mutatis mutandis, than the ongoing of so-called capitalism in Germany, England, or the United States. It would be rash to prophesy ultimate and general success for state socialism under such conditions as obtain in Soviet Russia. Perhaps the docility and malleability of the great mass of the Russian peasants, accruing from centuries of tyranny under the Czaristic régime, may prove a better fundamental factor for success, in a general and far-reaching experiment in socialism, than would a better-educated and more intellectual population, like that of Germany or England. But the experiment is interesting. At present, it contrasts with conditions in capitalistic countries, with their millions of unemployed. Anyway, it is enough to give us a much-needed dose of modesty about our "American capitalistic system."

Present commodity price conditions remind us of the conditions in the nineties, when we had violent hysteria lest we go to a 50-cent dollar. The gold standard won in 1896. We saw the purchasing power of a gold dollar go to 40 cents. Savings in the nineties were halved, or worse, on the gold basis. Within about two years commodity prices have dropped 20 to 30 per cent. This alone might be a sufficient cause for the world-wide depression in agriculture, in manufacturing, and in merchandizing. The gold standard is again under just suspicion. It clearly is not a reliable measure of value. It causes wide and destructive fluctuations in general prices. It thus works intolerable injustice in the relations of debtors and creditors. A stable currency is a fundamental necessity to any sound and honest economic system. The gold standard is only less bad than paper money; it falls far short of being stable.

Great Britain borrowed over four billions of us, taking the loans in war-priced goods and munitions. Later she agreed to repay us, in gold, in full, with a fair interest rate. International debts must mostly be paid, if at all, in goods and services. On present prices, Great Britain is doomed to pay us three to five times the amount of her real debt. But we settled with France and Italy by composition in bankruptcy. Charging our relations many times what we do other folks seems based on what George Eliot once called "a cordial blood-relation's hatred." England's attempt to keep the whole world on the gold standard seems now foolish and futile.

We now see much discussion of an "American plan," apparently to be made by an "economic council" with "a board of strategy and planning to survey productive facilities and consumption capacity."

Assuming such "economic council" and its output of a very wise plan, who could make it operative?

"The best-laid schemes o' mice an' men
Gang aft' a-gley,
An' lea'e us nought but grief an' pain
For promis' joy."

Our present dominant and controlling force is profit seeking. Most of our forceful personalities are vigorously active in getting to themselves the utmost possible of natural resources and other people's earnings. They control our Government and our lawmaking, and much of our law administration. A "plan" without power to effectuate it is words only—futility.

Dr. Nicholas Butler's suggestion that our statesmen and economists might well read and consider Progress and Poverty is the only intimation that I have seen from any responsible, capitalistic source that limiting the opportunities for individual acquisition of socially created property might do something for the hard times. No one else (so far as I have seen) has ventured to suggest that we adopt the policy of "rendering unto Cæsar the things that belong to Cæsar."

The cures for this present depression suggested in the great mass of financial, economic, and banking literature remind one of the incantations of the medicine men of the American Indians. Their remedies are fantastic or at best sterile.

All governments are, on adequate analysis, oligarchies. The United States is no exception; only in form is it democratic—or even republican. Cutting through form to realities, our real rulers are but a few—many of these few not holding political office. A competent observer has recently given a list, I think, of only 64 men, who, this observer thinks, really rule in America. His list may not be correct; but his general proposition of a controlling oligarchy is clearly true. Our Government has, fairly enough, been called an "invisible government." The number of our real rulers may not be more than in Russia or Italy—probably less than in England.

There is not and never has been any such thing as a "government of the people, by the people, for the people" anywhere, at any time. It is a nonexistent trinity. The most to be sought—or even hoped for—is government for the people. Such a government would be in striking contrast with our Government—especially for the last 10 years.

Our Government, by two opposing parties, has not resulted in giving us any approximate, economic, democracy. In fact, during my generation the main reason for being a Democrat has been to avoid being a Republican. This for over 40 years has been an entirely adequate, though not highly satisfactory, reason for voting the Democratic ticket. In general, probably because of its long lease of dominant power, the Republican Party has been far more plutocratic than the Democratic Party. Under our economic system any party given a long period of domination is almost certain to succumb to plutocracy. That is here and everywhere the great enemy of real democracy. To shift the party in power is merely to apply a slight check, possibly some trifling reforms. But neither party has any general program for an intelligently and effectively planned economic civilization. The most that can be said is that one party is now more generally and subserviently committed to the exploiting and plutocratic forces than the other.

Prophecy is in general a risky undertaking, unless one is a statistician and selling his prophecies at a good price. But it seems fairly safe to prophesy that we shall muddle along, possibly "muddle through," whatever that phrase may mean. At any rate, there is no visible sign that we shall substantially limit the present opportunities for predatory wealth, cut down the existing methods of exploitation, both of productive labor and of natural resources. "Individualism," as its proponents really mean it, connotes keeping essentially all of the outstanding methods of heaping up large fortunes and excessive, unearned incomes. Our present planless civilization will remain, for an indefinite period, planless. It is now predatory and aleatory. So it will remain. Our leaders in business and in government are chance takers. They believe in gambling, at least in social and economic relations to natural resources and to the output of others' labor. We absurdly prohibit, by law, lotteries and some other forms of gambling, while resolutely maintaining an industrial organization essentially aleatory and predatory. Probably the Anglo-Saxons and the Irish are the greatest gamblers in the world. Mr. Winston Churchill, when Chancellor of the Exchequer, proposed to tax betting. He apparently found it the most cherished English industry. At any rate, he abandoned the attempt. The very essence of gambling is getting other people's property without returning value. This also is the essence of our so-called "system." In fact, we do not want stability. We prefer our present chaos, slightly and sporadically modified, to any coordinated and stable system.

We have no respect for property rights grounded on productive work only. Gettings—not producing—we regard as sacred under our Constitution. "Normalcy" with us is a predatory and aleatory capitalism.

The above-described methods of getting what does not really belong to the getters are consistent neither with a sound capitalism nor a sound socialism. Instead of promoting individualism and personal incentive of an honest and wholesome kind, they discourage it. A "rugged individualism" is not legitimately grounded on gambling chances for acquiring unearned natural resources, properties socially created, or properties produced by others. An economic system in which property rights should be approximately grounded on useful work, not inconsistent with social welfare, might be called either capitalistic or socialistic, but it would be a tolerant organization and infinitely preferable to our present chaotic and grossly unjust American system.

It is clear enough that our "American system" does not work. Evolution to a better system—not revolution—is the desideratum. Revolutions ordinarily are but new forms of chaos and waste; evolution, though frequently slow and disappointing, is generally constructive.

IMPORTATIONS OF COTTON

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I offer and request that there be printed in the RECORD a resolution adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of Stockton, Calif., in respect to the tariff on long-staple cotton.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution

Whereas it is understood the stocks of imported cotton have been reduced to a point whereby the American producer of staple cotton will soon be able to receive the premiums he is entitled to for his efforts to produce a superior quality of cotton; and

Whereas the Stockton Chamber of Commerce is sympathetic to the interests of agriculture in general and particularly the interests of the cotton growers of the San Joaquin Valley; and

Whereas the San Joaquin Valley cotton growers can and do produce a superior quality of staple cotton of 1⅛ inches and better; and

Whereas the cotton growers of the San Joaquin Valley did at one time receive a premium of from 2 to 4 cents per pound above market quotations due to the quality and staple of their cotton, which for several years past has not been obtainable, due, in a great extent, to the importation of cotton; and

Whereas the effect of the tariff on imported cotton is just now beginning to have its effect in aiding the cotton grower of the San Joaquin Valley to attain a fair premium on his longer staple lengths because of the reduced stocks of imported cotton: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the board of directors of the Stockton Chamber of Commerce, in special session assembled, Thursday, December 3, 1931, working in the interests of agriculture and the cotton growers of the San Joaquin Valley, does hereby urge that the United States Tariff Commission keep in force the import duty of 7 cents per pound on cotton of 1⅛ inches and better; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be spread upon the minutes of the special meeting of the board of directors of the Stockton Chamber of Commerce of Thursday, December 3, 1931, and that copies be sent to the United States Tariff Commission, and all other parties interested.

RALPH W. CARTER, President.
A. M. ROBERTSON, Secretary-Manager.

This is to certify that this is a true and correct copy of resolution passed by the board of directors of the Stockton Chamber of Commerce in special session assembled, Thursday, December 3, 1931.

A. M. ROBERTSON, Secretary-Manager.

PROMOTION OF AGRICULTURAL INTERESTS

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I send to the desk certain resolutions adopted at the thirteenth annual convention of the American Farm Bureau Federation on December 9, 1931, at Chicago. The resolutions set forth the views of this organization on legislation now before the Congress affecting the interests of agriculture. I ask unanimous consent to have the resolutions referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered:

The resolutions are as follows:

Resolutions adopted by American Farm Bureau Federation voting delegates at annual meeting

NO. 1. THE AGRICULTURAL MARKETING ACT

In enacting the agricultural marketing act Congress recognized the farm problem and gave to American agriculture a national farm policy. In its declaration of policy Congress declared its intention that the act was designed to dispose of surpluses, to stimulate cooperative marketing of farm products, to make the tariff more effective on farm crops, to provide cooperative marketing associations with credit facilities more nearly comparable to those enjoyed by other groups, and to establish a Farm Board to administer the act in ways to accomplish the above purposes.

Time and experience of more than two years in its operation have demonstrated the inadequacy of the act properly to control crop surpluses and to make agricultural tariffs effective. The American Farm Bureau Federation has repeatedly stated, and still believes, to accomplish this purpose the equalization fee must be included in the act. We therefore insist that the present Congress amend the agricultural marketing act by including the equalization fee or some other equally effective method whereby the cost of controlling crop surpluses would be borne by each unit of the commodity benefited.

The American Farm Bureau Federation hereby expresses its willingness to support additional amendments that would give further power and authority to the Farm Board for the more complete carrying out of the policies of the act.

We pledge our continued support to the Federal Farm Board in all efforts put forth to administer the marketing act in such manner as will best serve the American farmer and urge that in the development and administration of cooperative marketing organizations the general farm organizations be properly recognized.

NO. 2. RURAL CREDITS

It is imperative that substantial improvement be made in the existing credit machinery serving agriculture. Joint-stock land banks should be separated from the Federal land-bank system. The intermediate credit bank should be controlled and operated apart from the land bank. The directorates of both should reflect a personnel representing the stockholders of such banks. The privileges of the intermediate credit system should be made available to agricultural cooperative purchasing groups. The debentures of the intermediate credit bank should be made eligible for note issue or collateral for borrowing by banks in the reserve system.

Federal land banks should be furnished additional governmental capital of at least $100,000,000, such capital to be redeemed as operations might justify, and thereafter maintained in a separate revolving fund for the purpose of stabilizing the system when necessary by (a) the acquiring of additional capital stock, and/or (b) the purchase of Federal land-bank bonds. Land-bank bonds should be made eligible for bank-reserve investments. The capital stock of the Federal land banks should be held only by members of such banks and transfer of stock should follow loans.

The credit problem involves organization as well as legislative responsibility. The associational feature of the Federal land-bank system should be preserved in building the agricultural credit structure of the country. To that end we recommend that all State farm bureaus include in their programs (1) the strengthening of existing local farm-loan associations and (2) the organization, wherever necessary, of new local farm-loan associations, local agricultural credit corporations, and credit unions. In order to serve cooperatively and more completely the credit needs of agriculture, we recommend to State farm bureaus that they give consideration to this type of credit and that credit unions be organized and properly integrated into our rural credit structure.

NO. 3. THE MONETARY PROBLEM

The present period of depression and the falling price level have increased the burden of taxes, interest, debts, and other fixed costs on all producers to an intolerable degree. It now requires 45 per cent more of all commodities and 70 per cent more of farm commodities to pay these costs than it did a few years ago. The long-continued deflation is crushing farmers, merchants, transportation agencies, and all manufacturers except a few most favorably situated, and has caused a declining price of property to such an extent that it has largely eliminated equities and is affecting basic securities to such an extent as to seriously impair the stability of our banking and insurance institutions, thereby endangering the welfare of the general public. It is causing a lowering of all wages and salaries, a process which has only started, and which must of necessity lower the standard of living if continued.

The principal cause of this deflation of values is monetary. When the price of any one commodity falls many causes may be responsible. When the average price level of all commodities fall with the rapidity of the last few years the principal cause is a shortage of money and credit in actual use. Commodity prices are expressed in this country in terms of dollars. Every purchase and sale is the exchange of commodities for dollars. When dollars are scarce it takes a larger amount of commodities to get them. In other words, money is at one end of the balance, commodities at the other. Add to the effective supply of money and prices go up. Reduce the effective supply and prices come down. The above statements are justified and supported by the incontrovertible evidence coming from the experience of all former depressions.

The problem divides itself into two parts: First, the restoration of the price level; and, second, the stabilization of the purchasing power of money.

I. RESTORATION OF PRICE LEVEL

Two alternatives face farmers and other business interests at this time: The first is wholesale bankruptcy for farmers, industrialists, transportation agencies, and mercantile establishments and the further deflation of wages and salaries; the second is a rapid rise in the average wholesale commodity price level to a point near that at the beginning of the present deflation, thereby restoring confidence and making it possible for individuals, corporations, and governments to discharge their obligations and to proceed with their undertakings.

All the powers of the Federal reserve system and the executive officials of the Federal Government should be used to bring about the restoration of the price level near the average level at which the present long-time indebtedness was incurred. The most important of these powers are:

1. Open-market purchases of eligible securities.
2. Lowering of rediscount rates.
3. Liberal interpretation of rediscount eligibility rules.

In order to relieve the Federal reserve authorities and other agencies connected therewith from discretionary authority, we recommend and insist that the Federal reserve law be amended so as to make mandatory the exercise of these powers, so far as possible and to the extent necessary, to restore the average wholesale commodity price level to the point indicated.

II. STABILIZATION OF MONEY

Permanent prosperity in this country demands that the dollar be made an accurate measure of value—that its purchasing power be always constant. This means stability of the average wholesale commodity price level instead of alternate periods of inflation and deflation which are the principal causes of business uncertainty and depression. Fluctuation in the purchasing power of the dollar causes serious losses to debtors in periods of deflation and to creditors in periods of inflation, and benefits only the speculator.

We recommend the following action by Congress to stabilize the purchasing power of money:

1. Direct the Federal reserve system to use all its powers, following restoration of price level, to stabilize the purchasing power of money in so far as possible, using for that purpose all its monetary and credit powers, including currency and credit control, open-market operation, and changes in rediscount rates and in rediscount eligibility rules.
2. Empower and direct the Federal Reserve Board to raise or lower reserve requirements of the Federal reserve banks and to raise or lower the price of gold.
3. Broaden the rediscount eligibility provision of the Federal reserve act.

NO. 4. TAXATION

We reaffirm the entire series of resolutions on taxation as amended and approved in the 1930 convention at Boston. We commend the State and local farm bureaus for the leadership they have shown in attacking the problems of taxation in the various States and communities.

The present rapidly mounting delinquency in taxes, increasing destruction of property values by confiscatory State and local taxation, and increasing inadequacy of revenues for necessary public services are due largely to unsound systems of revenue.

Unsound systems of revenue, both Federal and State, are due largely to selfish financial and political motives, which manifest themselves in wholesale exemption of many millions of our population of taxable capacity from any direct contribution to the cost of government, and in almost unrestricted competition instead of cooperation among the States and between the States and the Federal Government in matters of revenue. As a first step in correcting our unsound systems of revenue, we favor an act of Congress providing for appointment of a special national tax commission consisting of representatives of every major national economic group and the foremost authorities on taxation to consider and recommend sound and coordinated systems of taxation adapted to the needs of both Federal and State Governments.

NO. 5. TRANSPORTATION

The resolution of the twelfth annual meeting is reaffirmed.

The earnings of private car lines and other subsidiaries of railroads should be placed under jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Such consolidation of railroads as will reduce operating expenses and make possible lower freight rates on agricultural products is approved.

The Interstate Commerce Commission is urged to complete as soon as possible its present investigation of such expenditures of the railroads as are not under the supervision of that body as a basis for further action either of legislative or administrative character.

The unfair disadvantage to which the domestic producer is placed in the present system of allowing a lesser rail rate from the seaboard inland on imported than on domestic products should be eliminated.

The Interstate Commerce Commission should be denied the authority of allowing railroads to charge more for a short than for a long haul.

NO. 6. GRAIN FUTURES ACT

The American public is being called upon for a return of confidence and to put forth every effort for the stabilization of American business, industry, and agriculture. One of the greatest hindering influences to efforts being put forth in these directions is the continued system of short selling operating on the grain and other exchanges of the country. We favor such amendment to the grain futures act as is necessary to give the Secretary of Agriculture full power and authority to regulate and, if necessary, to remove any further operations in short selling (except for legitimate hedging purposes) on the grain exchanges of the country.

NO. 7. PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

Our Government since the time of the Spanish-American War, in various presidential and congressional documents, has promised eventual independence to the people of the Philippine Islands. Having protected and educated them in principles of representative government for approximately one-third of a century, it now is logical that inasmuch as the qualified electors of the islands have demonstrated their ability to maintain a stable government under our contacts with them through a Governor General, the time is at hand when our governmental promises should be completely fulfilled. It appears that the Filipinos have progressed to that degree of self-sufficiency as to enable them to maintain a stable government. Continued delay in granting independence to them is the result of large investments of American capital controlled by a few American citizens. Until independence is granted the present situation compels farmers in the United States to meet the unfair competition of Philippine products in our domestic markets.

We insist that independence be granted the Philippine Islands at the earliest possible moment so that the American market can be preserved for the American farmers.

NO. 8. RELATION OF FARM INCOME TO EXPENSE

The prices of farm products have declined in recent years much faster than have the prices on most commodities which farmers must buy. The prices on machinery, tools, and implements, fencing material, burlap, and various other necessary articles, although showing in some instances small declines in prices, are vastly out of line with the prices of farm crops. The board of directors and officials of the American Farm Bureau Federation are authorized and directed to do everything possible to bring farm income and farm expenses into proper relationship.

NO. 9. HOME AND COMMUNITY RECOMMENDATIONS

(a) Federal aid for elementary education: We insist that the time has come when the National Government should contribute a proper share in the expenses of elementary education, doing so, however, without the establishment of any additional Federal machinery or officials.

(b) Maternity and infancy legislation: We recommend the further support of legislation in behalf of the infancy and maternity act.

(c) Copyright design bill: We oppose the passage of the so-called copyright design bill.

(d) Truth in fabrics: To secure the public information which is available in buying most other commodities, it is urged that truth-in-fabrics legislation be enacted by Congress.

NO. 10. TARIFF

The American farmers carry great responsibility for the maintenance of our protective system. If we are to continue this support, tariff schedules must immediately be revised to a basis of equalization as between agriculture and all other industry.

We also insist that such changes be made in the flexible provision of the present law as will enable those responsible for its administration to make it operate effectively in emergencies.

NO. 11. WATERWAY DEVELOPMENT

All inland waterway development now under construction as an aid in completing the transportation system of our Nation should be completed as soon as possible. Particular attention should now be given to the St. Lawrence deep-waterway channel in hastening the adoption of the treaty negotiations with Canada, and by enacting all necessary enabling legislation to make effective the provisions of the treaty.

Other possible waterway projects should be ascertained by a continuation of the surveys now under way by the Chief of Army Engineers.

NO. 12. MUSCLE SHOALS

The operation of Muscle Shoals under the direction of organized agriculture along cooperative lines, distributing the products to the farmers on a cost basis, is the most desirable way to handle this project for the benefit of the entire Nation.

NO. 13. POWER REGULATION

The American public has in former times paid heavily for developments of enterprises which proceeded seemingly without regard to public welfare and frequently in defiance thereto. At the present time the so-called power influence is potent in our Nation and must be brought under control and regulation of Government. The pyramiding of capital costs, the interlocking of directorates in subsidiary or overhead corporations, and the centralized control prevalent within the power group are such as to demand Federal and State legislation in the public welfare. Power sites should not be granted applicants therefor unless financial guarantees of immediate development and penalties for failure to develop are imposed. Power corporations should be compelled to apply, each in its own right, for permits to construct power dams. Transmission lines should be made common carriers of power.

NO. 14. POSTAL RATES

In any efforts to balance the budget of the Post Office Department we oppose increased rates on first and fourth class matter. The deficit in the Post Office Department is caused largely by other classes of mail service. It is unfair to the main body of citizens who use the first and fourth class services of the Post Office Department, in which classes no material deficit is found, to impose on them higher rates in an effort to overcome the deficit created by such other services.

NO. 15. WATER-USERS PROBLEMS

The farmers in at least 12 Western States, many of whom live on irrigation districts either Federal or private, have problems in regard to water supply as troublesome and more costly than are the water troubles of the main body of our farmers who live in areas where rainfall is dependent upon to produce crops.

The irrigation farmer is a part of the national agricultural industry and should have devoted to him and to his business the same careful consideration which is sought to be devoted to agriculture in our Nation as a whole.

Wherever reclamation developments now in operation find themselves in need of additional water to be secured by storage or otherwise, of reconstructed works and equipment which have either become obsolete or have outlived the period of usefulness, of additional credit to refinance on longer terms of payment and lesser annual charges both the original indebtedness on the loan and the annual water-right payment, then the settlers on these projects should have the attention and consideration on the part of Federal and State governments, and of the Nation as a whole, which are necessary and essential to the solution of reclamation problems.

Further, wherever these reclamation projects have been denied by power interests or by utility boards of the development and distribution of the power resources resident within the water used for irrigation purposes, all such denials of privileges to use their own water both for power and irrigation should be removed to the end that the profits from power might be used by the reclamation districts as a valuable aid in payment of amortization, interest, and construction charges on the projects.

Whatever new reclamation projects are thought to be necessary should be analyzed, first, to see their future relationships to the national economy of agriculture; and second, to ascertain whether or not farmers on such new projects would be thrown into direct competition with other farmers on established reclamation areas and elsewhere. In assisting settlers on irrigation and drainage districts to refinance themselves on a more equitable basis than originally was thought necessary, legislation should be enacted to provide a revolving fund for use as loans to extend credit periods into longer lengths of time, thereby enabling the farmers more adequately to meet annual payments.

NO. 16. NATIONAL LAND POLICY

We are unalterably opposed to additional authorization by Congress of any new reclamation projects until consumptive demands meet productive capacity. Upon Congress is urged the immediate adoption of a national land-utilization policy which will provide for the removal from production of large areas of land now generally classed as marginal or submarginal in character. We recognize the impossibility of continuing such lands in production on a profitable basis, and to do so adds to our surplus problems. It is recommended that, in withdrawing these unproductive lands, the public needs for parks, playgrounds, game preserves, future forested areas, and watershed protection be satisfied.

It is further urged that our national land policy include provision for:

The complete inventory of our land resources;

Taxation adjustments, taking into consideration areas taken from production;

Reclamation projects and policies to be integrated with the national land policy through the Department of Agriculture;

The public domain and national forests to be administered jointly by Federal agencies;

Reforestation on the widest possible scale by Federal, State, county, township, and municipal units of the Government jointly and severally.

NO. 17. COMMENDING SECRETARY HYDE

We commend Secretary Hyde for his fearless leadership of official agriculture in our Nation, particularly in regard to the manner in which he has discharged the many regulatory responsibilities which have been placed upon the Department of Agriculture in regard to the packer and stockyards act, the grain futures act, the food and drugs act, and the quarantine control measure.

PRICES OF PORK PRODUCTS

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I would like to make an inquiry of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER]. A moment ago he asked to have certain resolutions printed in the RECORD. Were those resolutions entitled "Live hogs and retail pork prices too far apart"?

Mr. CAPPER. No; I sent to the desk resolutions adopted by the American Farm Bureau Federation at its annual convention in Chicago, which include their declaration on various bills pending in Congress. It covers some six or eight different measures.

Mr. NORRIS. That is a different matter than the one I am about to present, then. Mr. President, I ask leave to print in the RECORD a statement given to the press by the Federal Farm Board. I want to read just a sentence or two from that statement, as follows:

The figures quoted were developed by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics in the United States Department of Agriculture. With agencies between the farmer and the consumer making little or no reduction in their margins, practically all the burden of supplying the consuming public with low-priced pork products is being carried by farmers.

I may interpolate that in the earlier part of the bulletin they show how the farmer is getting the same return under the high prices now charged the consumer that he got when the consumer was paying lower prices.

The percentage farmers receive of retail prices of pork products is the smallest on record.

I wish Senators would take notice of this statement, that according to these statistics there has never been a time in the history of the United States when the farmers received retail prices of pork products so small as now.

Current retail prices warrant considerably higher prices for hogs than farmers are receiving.

This statement is issued in the interest of agriculture and business generally, for upon hogs more than any other commodity depends payment of taxes and other bills in a very large section of our country.

Mr. President, I ask that the entire bulletin may be printed in the RECORD at this point and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The bulletin is as follows:

LIVE HOG AND RETAIL PORK PRICES TOO FAR APART

The following statement was made to-day—December 17—by Mr. C. B. Denman, member Federal Farm Board:

"Farmers are receiving much less for live hogs than is justified by prices consumers are paying for pork products. On December 15 prices at New York retail markets for good grade pork chops averaged 26 cents a pound, a reduction of 7 cents, or 21 per cent, from the price December 15, 1930; ham, 22 cents a pound, a reduction of 7½ cents, or 25 per cent; sliced bacon, 32 cents a pound, a reduction of 9 cents, or 22 per cent; picnics, 14½ cents a pound, a reduction of 5½ cents, or 27 per cent; and lard, 13½ cents a pound, a reduction of 3 cents, or 18 per cent, from a year ago. Prices of live hogs at Chicago for the week ending December 12 averaged only $4.18 a hundredweight compared to $7.92 for the corresponding week in 1930, a reduction of $3.74, or 47 per cent. The figures quoted were developed by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics of the United States Department of Agriculture.

"With agencies between the farmer and the consumer making little or no reduction in their margins, practically all the burden of supplying the consuming public with low-priced pork products is being carried by farmers. The percentage farmers receive of retail prices of pork products is the smallest on record. Current retail prices warrant considerably higher prices for hogs than farmers are receiving.

"This statement is issued in the interest of agriculture and business generally, for upon hogs more than any other commodity depends payment of taxes and other bills in a very large section of our country."

REPORTS ON LAWLESSNESS IN LAW ENFORCEMENT

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, I send to the desk a resolution which I would like to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 116) (submitted by Mr. CUTTING, Mr. WALSH of Montana, and Mr. COSTIGAN), as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit to the Senate any and all reports prepared by experts of the National Commission on Law Observance and Enforcement under the direction of Judge William S. Kenyon, chairman of the subcommittee on lawlessness in law enforcement, including any that may have been made touching the cases of Thomas J. Mooney and Warren K. Billings.

The VICE PRESIDENT. What disposition does the Senator from New Mexico desire to have made of the resolution?

Mr. CUTTING. I ask that the resolution may lie on the table for the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie on the table.

FOREIGN-DEBT MORATORIUM

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 147) to authorize the postponement of amounts payable to the United States from foreign governments during the fiscal year 1932, and their repayment over a 10-year period beginning July 1, 1933, was read twice by its title.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Finance Committee has already met and considered the joint resolution and instructed me to submit a report upon it which I now send to the desk (Rept. No. 17). Later in the day I shall ask that the Senate consider the joint resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I did not hear the request of the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. I gave notice that I would call up the moratorium measure later in the day. It was considered by the Finance Committee this morning and ordered to be reported, and I have just submitted the report to the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON. When the Senator says he will call it up later in the day, does he mean to have it taken up for debate to-day?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; taken up for debate.

Mr. JOHNSON. So far as I may object to any such procedure I shall do so.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course the Senator can object.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then, it will come up Monday in the regular course.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; it will come up Monday in the regular course.

Mr. JOHNSON. If I should be absent this afternoon——

Mr. SMOOT. That is sufficient. All the Senator has to do is to say that he would object, and I shall then not call it up until Monday.

Mr. JOHNSON. I should object.

Mr. SMOOT. I would judge so from what the Senator said.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, is it contemplated by the Senator from Utah to make the joint resolution the unfinished business?

Mr. SMOOT. I shall bring it up Monday and hope to have it passed on that day.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Then, I assume the Senator has waived his intention of bringing it up to-day?

Mr. SMOOT. An objection was made by the Senator from California, and, of course, it has to go over a day.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, is it the intention of the Senator from Utah to seek to have the joint resolution passed prior to the Christmas recess?

Mr. SMOOT. It is.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, as I have just come into the Chamber, I would like to ask the Senator from Utah whether he intends to take up the matter for discussion before the Finance Committee this afternoon?

Mr. SMOOT. The Finance Committee has already passed upon it.

Mr. WATSON. There is no further action required by that committee?

Mr. SMOOT. No; there is not.

Mr. WATSON. I wanted that statement made because several members of the Finance Committee had asked me about it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, is it the intention of anyone connected with this particular measure to take it up for discussion at all before it is passed?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator will have a chance to discuss it Monday.

Mr. JOHNSON. Really! I did not realize that! [Laughter.]

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator knew that without asking the question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On objection, the joint resolution goes over.

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, despite the fact that in the hearings before the Senate Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, considering the subject of Philippine independence, the opponents of the bill for independence were unable to give the names of any number of Filipinos who did not favor complete independence. Word-of-mouth propaganda that the substantial Filipino business men did not want independence has been circulated. Now, this is being changed to the statement that they would be satisfied with increased autonomy.

These statements are not correct. Neither the commissioners, Mr. Quezon, General Aguinaldo, or the commission will be satisfied with anything else than independence.

During the past summer General Parker, Chief of the Bureau of Insular Affairs, and myself were guests of the Philippine Chamber of Commerce representing the business men of the Philippine Islands. There were present on that occasion many well-known Filipino business men and financiers. Mr. Isaac Barza, president of this organization, delivered an address which was very vigorously applauded and approved by the audience, showing conclusively that the Filipino business men are for independence.

As the position of the business men on this subject has been called into question I ask permission to insert in the RECORD a resolution adopted by the Philippine Chamber of Commerce, a list of those present at the dinner above referred to, and the address of Mr. Barza, the president of the organization.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matters referred to are as follows:

RESOLUTION EXPRESSING THE SENTIMENTS OF THE FILIPINO BUSINESS MEN IN FAVOR OF THE LIBERATION OF THE PHILIPPINES

Whereas it has been repeatedly said that only the politicians clamor for Philippine independence; and

Whereas this is the first time that the Filipino business men, as a body, have the opportunity to express their sentiments regarding this matter: Therefore be it

Resolved to express, as it is hereby expressed, That the Filipino business men in national convention assembled strongly favor the national aspiration for independence and are ready to cooperate in the common task for the liberation of the country.

Adopted unanimously in Manila this the 9th day of February of 1929.

Approved.

ADDRESS DELIVERED BY MR. ISAAC BARZA, PRESIDENT OF THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS, AT THE DINNER ON JUNE 23, 1931

Our distinguished guests, Senator HARRY B. HAWES, Gen. Frank Le J. Parker, and members of the congressional party, gentlemen, in the name of the Chamber of Commerce of the Philippine Islands in particular and of the business sector of the Filipino Nation in general, I wish to extend to you our sincere welcome and greetings. In so doing we are not actuated by mere outward courtesy or empty gesture, but by a feeling of genuine gratitude toward you for the unselfish service you have rendered on behalf of our people. We sincerely consider your company a genuine pleasure, a distinct privilege, and a high honor. We feel that only the highest of motives have prompted you to visit these far-flung possessions of the American Empire, hence we place ourselves at your command to assist you in every possible way to accomplish the purpose of your visit.

May it not be amiss to say at the outset of these brief remarks that the Filipino business men, contrary to concerted efforts of rumor, gossip, and calculated misrepresentation, have always been, and are to this moment, convinced that early and absolute Philippine independence will not only be for their best interest but that it is the only permanent solution to the problems of relationship between the American and the Filipino people. While there may be "Tories" among us who can be located by selfish, vicious, and pernicious parties to serve their personal interests, to assert that the Filipino vested interests are against independence is not only un-American but is untrue.

The business sector of the Filipino Nation has time again and at every opportunity consciously and earnestly shown that it is ready to pay the cost of independence. It has rendered spontaneous and whole-hearted support to all campaigns for liberty, and it has repeatedly pledged its loyalty and expressed its faith in those who are patriotically consecrating their lives to the proposition that the Filipinos are entitled to guide and shape their own destinies. Again, very recently, when the news reached us that the Hawes-Cutting bill had passed the committee, we immediately cabled our approval and our support. In spite of all these, our friendly detractors, in patronizing attitude, tell us that we do not want independence.

Hence, the great dilemma. What a plight, what a puzzle we find ourselves in. Everything that we do is misunderstood! Every word that we utter is given the contrary meaning. If we say we want independence, we are told to our face that we do not understand what it is nor would we be willing to pay the cost. Even our motives are questioned. Of course, it will be the height of folly and it will be suicidal to resort to the method used by the fathers of the American Republic in 1776. Even peaceful non-cooperation and passive resistance will be taken as gross ingratitude and an affront to the sovereign power. Any national or patriotic movement, personal or organized, will be looked upon with suspicion and disfavor. What is there then that can be done to convince the sovereign power that we are in dead earnest for our freedom? Perhaps the American people expect the Filipino people to furnish this modern age a novelty, a new method and a new approach in securing our freedom.

It is, therefore, a source of gratification to all of us who are earnestly seeking the right solution of the Philippine question, that our distinguished guests to-night—men whose voices carry great authority and weight in Congress—have come to our land to be able to feel the pulse and throb of our national heart. We are happy that you are here to see and observe for yourselves that here truly exists a national longing, a burning desire, and a determined struggle for independence. You will convince yourselves that there is here a nationalistic spirit—energetic and powerful, yet controlled by reason and patience, dynamic in potentiality, yet tempered by faith and confidence. Here is something which can not be conveyed in words. It is that, we trust, that our visitors would feel and catch while they are in our midst.

As a natural result of long delays, of seeming evasion, and apparent lack of courage to face our demand for independence, there has developed an atmosphere of uncertainty which is a source of constant suspicion, of irritation, and hushed anxiety. Whatever views one may have, either friendly or unfriendly, to Philippine independence, everyone agrees that the difficulties arising from this atmosphere of uncertainty, are real and actual in all walks of Philippine life, in all phases of national existence. Yes, gentlemen, the evil and pernicious effects of this uncertainty are to be observed not only in our political relationships but even in the other realms that affect, perhaps, more vitally the everyday life, our two peoples. Something should be done to solve these difficulties.

The first important realm that is greatly affected by this political uncertainty is the Philippine-American economic relations. As it is, our national legislature and our leaders in the Filipino participation in the Government are powerless to solve the most important economic problems in the islands, especially when it comes to the problems of tariff and foreign-trade relationships, as these powers are still reserved in the hands of the sovereign government. And when our leaders and our business elements mobilize efforts to utilize the only means within their hands, and when through such laudable efforts as the Economic Katipunan, or the movement for economic protectionism, they attempt to solve the grave economic problems that confront our people, immediately there come accusations of ingratitude and lack of a proper international perspective.

The difficulties, not to speak of the injustices arising from the uncertain status of Filipino-American economic relations, have been so clearly and masterfully discussed by our representatives in the American Congress and by the members of our various missions that an attempt to essay them to-night would be an imposition upon your patience. It should, therefore, suffice to say that from the early dawn of American rule to the present day American economic relations with us have undoubtedly taken a course not so very different from that followed by other empires, not so altruistic in their dealings with their colonies. Congressional measures affecting the economic relations of our two peoples have relegated to the background the best interests of the Filipinos and have been enacted primarily for the benefit of American vested interests. The present tariff legislation, not to mention others, seem to be the most obvious illustration of this fact. The historical pronouncement that the Philippines are "not ours to exploit" but to develop for the benefit of the Filipinos themselves seems to have been but an expression of a pious hope. Even those of us who can not claim thorough knowledge of Philippine tariff relations have been made to realize from recent events that Philippine interests are being served only incidentally when they serve American interests. But we are helpless and our hands are tied. Bold though it may seem, yet in all candor and honesty, and with all our faith and confidence in the motives of America, we might ask the question, What will happen next? In such a situation of uncertainty and of suspense as to the next development, is it little wonder that capital—whether local or foreign—would hesitate to venture into the islands, thus greatly curtailing the profitable and progressive commercial intercourse, as well as the full economic development of the country?

It is not alone in our economic relations where we find the sad and unfortunate effects of this uncertainty of our political status. In the educational field our undefined status has prevented the formulation and execution of plans, adequate and effective, for the development of an indigenous national culture. We have no national educational policy or orientation.

Is it Washington or Rizal who should be held as an example of patriotism? Is the spirit of nationalism, of an admirable love of country, being given its full encouragement, cultivation, and flowering in our public schools? While those at present connected with our school system might, out of loyalty to the work to which they have given the best part of their lives, be inclined to justify the present system, they themselves would admit that there is still so much that can be done that has not yet been done, simply because of the present uncertainty, in our relationship with the American Nation. It must be admitted that, because of this uncertainty, there exists in the public schools, where both American and Filipino teachers are working, a delicate situation, a feeling of caution, of unwholesome secrecy, of a guarded attitude, at times of suspicion between American teachers on one side and the Filipino teachers on the other. Illustrations have been altogether too common in the past few years, revealing this delicate situation existing in the public schools. There have been times when whole schools have gone on strike because of the statements alleged to have been made by this or another American teacher. How can we, in such a situation, hope to develop the ideals of national loyalty and of patriotism; how can we expect the schools to be the fountain of a loyal national citizenry?

This uncertainty of our political situation projects its ugly head to other realms just as vital, especially in the realm of our social relationships, or our international and interracial intercourse. After nearly 30 years of living together, mutual understanding and fellowship is yet to be attained. Our American friends in guarded attitude, due either to a sense of superiority or of sovereignty, have very limited or no social dealings with the Filipinos. In fact, the Filipinos have as great, if not greater, a share of the blame because of their attitude of restraint, of suspicion, and of unwillingness to open the way. Thus a very strained, if not actually indifferent, state of relationships and feelings exist between the two peoples. Who is the boss, the host, and the guest in this atmosphere of uncertainty? In fact, even in religious circles, where the feeling of fraternity and equality are more to be expected than in other places, these strained relations exist.

Perhaps it is in the government where one finds most evident, though not so apparent, the unwholesome effects of this present uncertain political situation. There is a state of courteous watchful waiting, yet a clear and cautious watchfulness lest one or the other group gets the upper hand. Every new appointment raises the question as to which should be appointed—should it be a Filipino or an American? The appointments of boards of directors of various governmental and quasi-governmental enterprises are guided by the desire of placing either the American or the Filipino membership in the majority. There seems to be an unconscious inclination on the part of each side to be placed in a greater position of power than the other. A more unwholesome atmosphere is unimaginable. Under such undefined, unsettled relationships, it seems difficult to determine as to who are really responsible in the government. One group can as easily escape the responsibility and lay the blame on the other. All of these are results of the present uncertain situation of our political status.

And what is the reason for this uncertainty? Is it because our people have been unwilling to pay the price? Is it because our leaders have been unwilling to put forth the necessary efforts to obtain our coveted goal? Is it because our people have not yet fully shown their intense desire to obtain their national aspirations? Far from it! Our people have been willing to pay the price. Our leaders have not hesitated to go to the full limit of their capabilities and possibilities to bring us nearer the goal. Time and again our people have shown, in actions clear and indubitable, that they are ready and determined to do all that is expected of them to realize their dream.

What is this price that has been paid? It is not in terms of money alone. An estimate has been made of what our campaign in America has cost us in terms of pesos, in which it has been estimated that we have actually spent for our independence missions in the United States the total amount of over two and a half million pesos for the last 15 years since we obtained the Jones law in 1916. We are a poor people, but we have not regretted having spent that much. In fact, we are willing to spend much more. Big commercial concerns are spending proportionately as much, if not much more, every year just for a thorough and adequate publicity for their goods. The returns in greater friendship and understanding, in the formation and establishment of cultural relations, in the winning of more friends such as we have to-night, and many others in the United States, have more than justified the price that has been paid.

But, my friends, it is not in terms of pesos that the greatest price may have to be paid. What is that which may be considered the most costly price that has to be paid? Here in the Pearl of the Orient Seas a whole people, 13,000,000 in number, have been schooled in the spirit of loyalty and confidence, of trust in the altruism of the American Nation, of a child-like faith that the great American people will fulfill the promise they have given of granting the Filipinos their long-coveted freedom. Now, we see all that confidence gradually turning into distrust, that trust being transformed into suspicion, and that child-like faith being replaced by a cold, sour, and bitter cynicism! How sad, how tragic, how heart-rending it is to see such an unwelcome transformation in the spirit and attitude of our people. What a tremendous price to pay! And God grant that the Filipinos will not be forced to pay this price.

But yet there are already indications of a tide of restlessness, of an unescapable feeling of distrust, of an irresistible attitude of suspicion that is gripping our people by the heart. And something must be done before the transformation becomes complete. For over 30 years our people, through their duly constituted authorities and leaders, through their legislatures and through various organizations have by means of peaceful and constitutional methods begged and pleaded for the redemption of the pledge of independence. Mission after mission has been sent to make presentations to the American Congress of the real hope and aspiration of our people. The people are beginning to lose faith not only with respect to American altruism but even, sad to state, with respect to the sincerity of our leaders, through no fault of their own. If our people are to be saved from cynicism and complete disillusionment, this situation must stop. This uncertainty must be solved. The Filipino people desire their independence. This has been promised to them. It is now but meet and proper that such promise should be fulfilled.

That in the solution of this problem, full consideration must be given to its economic consequences, to the actual loss in pesos and centavos that must necessarily come in case of independence, and to the willingness of our people to meet all these consequences with a smile, may be true, but that is beside the point. We are also made to understand, strange as it may seem, that the solution of this Philippine problem is really determined by the struggle between the vested American interests in America and the vested American interests in the Philippines. But that is also beside the point. Only one real issue remains and that is this: Whether in privation or in prosperity, the sincere hope, the earnest wish, and the all-consuming aspiration of the Filipino people is to become immediately and absolutely independent. That has been promised by America. We pray that America will keep her word.

BATTLEFIELDS IN UNITED STATES FOR COMMEMORATIVE PURPOSES

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

To the Congress of the United States:

In accordance with the provisions of the act of Congress approved June 11, 1926, entitled "An act to provide for the study and investigation of battlefields in the United States for commemorative purposes," I am transmitting a communication from the Secretary of War giving a detailed report of progress made under said act, together with his recommendation for further operations.

HERBERT HOOVER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, December 19, 1931.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Farrell, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed without amendment the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 39) extending the time within which the War Policies Commission is required to submit its final report.

PROPOSED HOLIDAY RECESS

The message also announced that the House had agreed to a concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 5), in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That when the two Houses adjourn on Tuesday, December 22, 1931, they stand adjourned until 12 o'clock meridian Monday, January 4, 1932.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, is it the intention to bring up to-day the concurrent resolution for a recess?

Mr. McNARY. The intention is to bring it before the Senate for its consideration on Monday.

HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION REFERRED

The concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 5) was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That when the two Houses adjourn on Tuesday, December 22, 1931, they stand adjourned until 12 o'clock meridian Monday, January 4, 1932.

AIRWAY BETWEEN PUGET SOUND, WASH., AND MINNEAPOLIS-ST. PAUL, MINN.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, during the last session of Congress we had an item in an appropriation bill of $20,000 for a survey of an air mail route along the northern part of the United States. That survey has been made. The report has been sent, with a letter from the Department of Commerce, addressed to me as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. I ask that it may be printed, with illustrations, as a Senate document. There are some photographs with it, but I do not ask that they be printed. When it is printed I want the original documents returned to the Appropriations Committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADDITIONAL APPROPRIATIONS FOR VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 141) to provide additional appropriations for the Veterans' Administration for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the joint resolution be read for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (H. J. Res. 141) to provide additional appropriations for the Veterans' Administration for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the following sums are appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the Veterans' Administration for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932, namely:

Adjusted-service certificate fund: For an additional amount necessary under the World War adjusted compensation act (U. S. C., title 38, secs. 591–683; Supp. V, title 38, secs. 612–682), to provide for the payment of the face value of each adjusted-service certificate in 20 years from its date or on the prior death of the veteran, and to make loans to veterans and repayments to banks, in accordance with section 507 of the act, as amended, $200,000,000, to remain available until expended.

Adjusted-service and dependent pay: For an additional amount for "Adjusted-service and dependent pay, Veterans' Bureau," and for reimbursing the adjusted-service certificate fund the amount of disbursements heretofore made therefrom and properly chargeable to the appropriation "Adjusted-service and dependent pay," $3,925,000, to remain available until expended.

Hospital and domiciliary facilities and services: For carrying out the provisions of the acts entitled "An act to authorize an appropriation to provide additional hospital, domiciliary, and outpatient dispensary facilities for persons entitled to hospitalization under the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1931 (46 Stat. 1550); "An act to establish a branch home of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers in one of the northwest Pacific States," approved July 3, 1930 (46 Stat. 852); and "An act to provide for the establishment of a branch home of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers in one of the Southern States," approved June 21, 1930 (46 Stat. 792), the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is hereby authorized, subject to the limitations imposed by such acts, to enter into contracts and incur obligations in the full amount of the authorizations provided therein.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. JONES rose.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington explain what this joint resolution proposes to do?

Mr. JONES. I am going to do that. This is an emergency measure. It provides an appropriation of $3,925,000 for adjusted-service and dependent pay. That is the amount estimated by the department as necessary in order to make the required payments up to the 1st day of July.

The joint resolution also provides for the adjusted-service certificate fund an appropriation of $200,000,000, which is necessary under the terms of veterans' bonus legislation.

Mr. REED. Does that appropriation relate to the loans which we were told at the last session would be self-contained credit transactions?

Mr. JONES. It relates to those loans, I will say, and this appropriation will provide necessary funds up to the 1st of July, 1932.

There is also one other provision in the joint resolution. There is under existing law an authorization of $17,877,000 for veterans' hospitals, and so on, which amount has not been appropriated. There is at present no authority for the Veterans' Administration to enter into contracts for the construction of the hospitals. Authority is given in this measure for them to do that. That, in brief, is the purpose of the joint resolution.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. With reference to the amount carried in this joint resolution providing money to be loaned to the ex-service men on their bonus certificates, the Senator will recall that at the last session of Congress, in the day or two in which we had to act upon that measure, it was impossible to offer any amendments in the Senate with any expectation that they might be adopted without endangering the entire bill. So we were compelled to accept the bill as it came from the House.

When the Director of the Veterans' Bureau testified before the Senate Finance Committee he was under the impression that the House bill provided that loans might be made to ex-service men regardless of the date of the bonus certificate, and that it repealed the 2-year provision, so that ex-service men whose certificates were not at least two years old would have the right to borrow money upon them. It turned out subsequently that the director was mistaken; that the House bill did not repeal that section of the original law and, therefore, under the provisions of the bill those who did not rush in immediately to obtain certificates have been penalized for two years because they are denied the right to secure loans upon them.

It strikes me that that is a manifest injustice. The man who was not in a great hurry to get his bonus certificate certainly ought not to be penalized with reference to ability to borrow money upon it. I have introduced a bill to correct that injustice. The bill has been referred to the Committee on Finance. I should like to offer it as an amendment to the pending joint resolution, but I should like first to ask the Senator from Washington whether he would feel constrained to raise a point of order against such an amendment, it being in the nature of legislation on an appropriation bill?

Mr. JONES. After listening to the Senator's statement, I think I am in very hearty sympathy with his proposition. I believe, however, that the proposal should be acted upon by the legislative committee dealing with such matters and that it should not be put on a joint resolution of this character; certainly not upon an emergency appropriation measure. So I would have to raise the point of order against it.

Mr. BARKLEY. May I, without embarrassing the Senator, inquire whether as a member of the Finance Committee, of which he is a very new and a very delightful and valuable addition, we may expect his cooperation in securing action on the bill to which I have referred?

Mr. JONES. As I have said, from the Senator's statement, it strikes me that it is a very deserving proposition which he proposes; and unless something is brought forward which would cause me to change my mind I would certainly be heartily in favor of favorable action. I think the committee ought to take it up very promptly.

Mr. BARKLEY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am very glad to know the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] has introduced such a bill; I do not know but that it ought to go to the Committee on Military Affairs; but perhaps it is properly before the Finance Committee, and I hope the Senator will press it so that we may get it before the Senate.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is my intention to do so. I will say to the Senator that the Finance Committee has heretofore handled all ex-service veterans' legislation, and I assume that is the proper committee to which the bill should be referred.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is quite satisfactory to me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution is before the Senate and open to amendment.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADDITIONAL APPROPRIATION FOR EMPLOYMENT SERVICE

Mr. JONES. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 142) making an additional appropriation for the employment service, Department of Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the joint resolution be read for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 142) making an additional appropriation for the Employment Service, Department of Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with an amendment, on page 2, line 2, after the word "organization," to strike out the following provisos:

Provided further, That after January 1, 1932, no salary shall be paid in any field employment office under the Employment Service at a rate in excess of $2,000 per annum: Provided further, That this limitation shall not apply to the salary of any State director.

So as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That the sum of $120,000 is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932, for the Employment Service, Department of Labor, including the same objects and purposes specified under this head in the act making appropriations for the Department of Labor for the fiscal year 1932: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the establishment or maintenance of any employment office for which suitable space is not furnished free of rent by State, county, or local authority, or by individuals or organizations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I think I ought to make a brief statement with reference to this measure. The estimate that came down from the Budget Bureau was for $168,000. It is proposed to establish 54 new employment offices. The joint resolution as passed by the House makes an appropriation of $120,000. It is intended, however, that $120,000 shall take care of the 54 employment offices that may be established throughout the country. As the estimate came down, it was to provide for three employees at each of the offices. There are 96 such offices. At the present time at over half of those offices only two employees are provided for. They are supposed to cover the most important localities in the country. So the House took the position that it was not necessary to make an appropriation of $168,000 to provide for three employees at all the offices; but, under the joint resolution as the House passed it, provision will be made for three employees at half of the 54 new offices and two employees at the other half.

It was also estimated that $12,000 for rent, which was included in the $168,000, was not necessary, as the House put in a provision in this joint resolution requiring the different communities to furnish quarters without cost to the National Government.

The committee has proposed an amendment striking out the last two provisos. Those provisos read as follows:

Provided further, That after January 1, 1932, no salary shall be paid in any field employment office under the Employment Service at a rate in excess of $2,000 per annum: Provided further, That this limitation shall not apply to the salary of any State director.

That language is very broad. I think it was the general opinion of the Appropriations Committee that it not only applied to the $120,000 appropriated by this joint resolution but also applied to all employees now in the Employment Service and to those who would be appointed hereafter. If that is the correct construction, then, in effect, it starts out on a reduction of salaries. That is a proposition the committee feels we ought not to take up on this deficiency measure. Whatever may be our personal opinion as to whether there should be a cut in the salaries of employees of the Government, whether we favor it or are opposed to it, it is a proposition of great importance and should have careful study and consideration and should not be passed upon on a deficiency measure, the passage of which is very urgent. Furthermore, if it were passed upon here and action taken in accordance with the House provision, that, of course, would be a precedent for the future. So the committee felt that the provisos should be stricken out.

If it was intended merely to apply the limitation to the $120,000 appropriation, and especially to the $2,000 item, I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Secretary of Labor came before the committee and assured us that no one would be employed under this appropriation at a salary to exceed $2,000. That statement, I think, was given to the House committee also. So these provisos are really not necessary if we want to have the restriction apply to the $120,000 appropriation and the $2,000 restriction as to compensation. As I have said, the Secretary of Labor assured the committee that no one would be employed at exceeding $2,000, and the committee feels that his assurance may be relied upon.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me inquire of the Senator what is the salary of the State directors?

Mr. JONES. Some State directors are paid $3,000, some $3,500, and, I think, one or two, possibly, in New York and Chicago, are paid $4,000. My impression is, however, the statement was made that not to exceed $4,000 is paid for State inspectors.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Is that amount fixed in the discretion of the Secretary?

Mr. JONES. I rather think so.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. What limitations are put upon him under the law?

Mr. JONES. I made inquiry about my State and was told that $3,500 in my State was the highest salary paid. As I have said, some directors are paid $3,000. I think the amount paid to each director is stated in the hearings.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Are those the hearings before the Senate committee or the House committee?

Mr. JONES. They are the hearings before the House committee, and they are available.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am not sure what the conditions are elsewhere, but I know that at the office in Florida, with headquarters at Jacksonville, the director—and he is a very efficient and capable one—has only one clerk. I think that is insufficient, for he can not accomplish the work that he is intended to accomplish with only one clerk. He has to be out of the office a great deal of the time looking up positions and opportunities for people who are seeking employment, and he has only one clerk at the office to conduct the correspondence, which is very considerable, and to attend to the details in connection with the work. I think in the case of these offices there ought to be provision made for at least two clerks in addition to the director. I do not think they can accomplish a very great deal with a director and one clerk at a central office for the State.

Mr. JONES. May I say to the Senator that the director is for the State.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes.

Mr. JONES. This will provide for two clerks in the offices at any rate.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is all right. I am referring to the State director. He has only one clerk. I was in his office several times this fall, and he had only one clerk.

Mr. JONES. This does not deal with the State director's office at all.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator thinks the State director will have two assistants or clerks?

Mr. JONES. This measure does not deal with that. He probably will have what they find he needs. This measure deals only with the employment offices. It does not deal with the director's office.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understood that the only objection to furnishing this additional help there was that they did not have the money.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. JONES. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. Why does this deficiency appropriation come in here as a joint resolution? That has not been the customary way of dealing with deficiency appropriations, has it?

Mr. JONES. Oh, yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Always?

Mr. JONES. Oh, yes. One body can not make any appropriation except out of its contingent fund by anything except a joint resolution or a bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I understand that. This, however, according to its heading, is not called an appropriation bill.

Mr. JONES. But it is in effect that. It is a House joint resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand it is in effect that; but that is not the way it has been done in the past, is it?

Mr. JONES. Yes. Where a measure deals with practically one item, or one or two, it is usually called a House joint resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. Why could not this and the other joint resolution have been presented here in the shape of an appropriation bill, called a deficiency bill?

Mr. JONES. They could have been presented in that way, and I see no reason myself why that should not have been done.

Mr. NORRIS. What I am trying to get at is, why this change of procedure? There may be a good reason for it.

Mr. JONES. It is not a change of procedure.

Mr. NORRIS. We have not been doing things in that way in the past.

Mr. JONES. Oh, yes, we have. In the last Congress we passed 10 or 12 House joint resolutions covering one item of appropriation each.

Mr. NORRIS. As I remember, when these deficiency bills come in here they are called deficiency appropriation bills.

Mr. JONES. This is according to the custom. I can not see myself why the measure should not be called a bill, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. NORRIS. Then I should like to ask the Senator what object the House had in view when it put in the two provisos that the Senate committee has stricken out.

Mr. JONES. I have just stated that, and I will try to make it clear.

This provision was offered on the floor of the House. It was not reported by the House Appropriations Committee. As I construe the provision, apparently the intention of it is to see that after the 1st day of January no employee of the employment service, except State directors, shall draw more than $2,000 as salary. In other words, it applies not only to this $120,000 item and those who may be appointed under it, but it applies to all those who are already engaged in the service and to all field employment employees hereafter appointed, as the amendment must be construed as making permanent law.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, in the last Congress we had before us an appropriation bill, or perhaps another joint resolution like this—I think, however, it was an appropriation bill—to which a proviso was added that the Senate committee struck out; and it developed that the opposition to the proviso was simply to keep in office a certain person who had been appointed, and whose duties had been entirely taken care of or were believed to have been taken care of by other provisions. He was simply a political appointee. I am not sure that this is it, but it came in the same way, as I remember.

I did not participate much in the debate, but I remember that my colleague [Mr. HOWELL] did; and he had discovered that the object of putting the proviso in originally was to cut off from the pay roll of the United States Government that person, who, it was conceded by everybody, I think, ought to have been cut off before and never ought to have been appointed. He was put in there particularly for political purposes in order to draw a salary while he was engaged in going over the country, campaigning for or against the various people that it was thought best to defeat or to elect.

Is there anything of that kind here?

Mr. JONES. I will say to the Senator, regardless of the merits of the proposition he has referred to, that there is nothing of that kind in this measure. I think that was in the independent offices appropriation bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Probably it was.

Mr. JONES. But I can assure the Senator that there is nothing of that kind here.

Mr. NORRIS. I have had my colleague [Mr. HOWELL] telephoned for. I should like to have him see this item before the joint resolution is passed. I have no personal knowledge of it myself.

Mr. JONES. I can assure the Senator that there is nothing of that kind in this measure.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well; I accept the Senator's assurance.

Mr. JONES. I should like to put in the RECORD at this point the statement that employment has been furnished directly under the Employment Service to 761,425 persons, and in cooperation with the States and counties and municipalities employment has been furnished to 633,646 persons, or a total of 1,395,071 in seven months.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time and passed.

AIR MAIL CONTRACTS

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire to call up from the table Senate Resolution 53, which asks the Postmaster General for certain information. It was brought up yesterday and objected to by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY], with the understanding that it would be brought up again to-day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read Senate Resolution 53, submitted by Mr. McKELLAR on the 9th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, requested and directed to furnish to the Senate at the earliest practicable moment the following information:

1. A list of the various air mail contracts made for carrying air mail in the United States proper, such list to show the date of the contract, the name of the contractee, the mileage of the contract, the amount of compensation, the route of the contract, and the amounts of mail in pounds of each class carried under each contract. If a space contract has been entered into, give reasons for entering into such space contracts.

2. The same information in reference to all contracts handled by the department for the carriage of mails to foreign countries by air mail.

3. State whether the domestic contracts are uniform and, if so, furnish a copy of the contract entered into. If they differ, point out the differences in such contracts or furnish copies of same.

4. If the contracts for foreign air mail are uniform, furnish a copy of the uniform contracts, and if they differ point out the differences in such contracts.

5. The number and names of the corporations carrying air mail for the Government, the number and names of corporations bidding on contracts and whose bids were rejected, and give copies of all rejected bids.

6. The number of routes and the mileage of each which has been extended since the passage of the Watres Act, and the additional schedules.

7. A map of the United States showing the location and mileage of all routes now being used and showing the main routes and extensions, differentiating the same by markings showing the main routes and extensions on said map separately.

8. Give the names of the officers and the attorneys of each aircraft company carrying mails, together with the names of the board of directors of each company. If any contract is controlled by a holding company or companies, furnish the same information as to holding companies.

9. Finally a tabulated statement concerning all these contracts, showing, among other things, the number of bids received, and the amount of each bid and the reasons for rejecting same, if such bids were rejected, the bid accepted, the changes made in the contract by extension or otherwise, the amounts paid per mile, the amount of space, the number of pounds for the transportation of mail under original contracts, and the changes or extensions, the payments made to the various aircraft carriers and including the method of payment, and the amounts of appropriation and the amount expended out of said appropriation, and finally any other information pertinent to these contracts available in your office.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I should like to inquire whether the resolution has been reported from a committee.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; it is merely a request for the Postmaster General to furnish certain information in reference to these contracts.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered by the Senate and agreed to.

OCEAN MAIL CONTRACTS

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I make the same request in regard to a similar resolution, Senate Resolution 85, that it be taken from the table and passed. It relates to ocean mail contracts.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read Senate Resolution 85, submitted by Mr. McKELLAR on the 14th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, requested and directed to furnish to the Senate at the earliest practicable moment the following information, as of date June 30, 1931:

1. A list of the various ocean mail contracts made under Title IV, merchant marine act, 1928, with steamship companies for carrying ocean mail, such list showing the date of the contract, the name of the contractee, the mileage of the contract, the amount of compensation, the route of the contract, the number of voyages in fact made, the amounts of mail in pounds of each class carried under said contract on each such voyage, and the name of the vessel making each such voyage. If a space contract has been entered into, the amount of space purchased and paid for, and give reasons for entering into such space contracts.

2. The amounts of compensation which would have been paid for transporting such mail, each voyage, had there been no such contract.

3. State whether such contracts are uniform with each mail-ship company; and if so, furnish a copy of the contract entered into. If the several contracts differ, point out the differences in such contracts and furnish copies of each of same, also copies of the advertisements on which the bids were based, with date of first insertion.

4. The number and names of the corporations carrying ocean mail for the Government under such contracts, whether the said companies are organized under a State or national law or organized under the laws of foreign countries. If such companies or any of the same are owned or controlled by aliens or by foreign steamship companies or other holding companies, then give the names of such owning, holding, or controlling company, with the names of the board of directors of each contracting company and of each holding, controlling, and operating company.

5. The name of any other person or company bidding on contracts and the bids of which were rejected; the amounts of such rejected bids, and the reason for rejecting such bids, if such were rejected.

6. An ocean map showing the route and mileage of all such contracts, and showing the name of the company carrying each.

7. Give the names and officers and attorneys of each such contractor, together with the board of directors of each company.

8. Finally, a tabulated statement concerning all these contracts showing, among other things, the number of bids received, the amount of each bid and the reasons for acceptance or rejection of same, the bids accepted, the changes made in the contracts of any steamship company if changes have been made, the amounts paid per mile, the amount of space, the number of pounds for transportation by each steamship under the original contracts and the changes or extensions of contracts, the payments actually made to various mail-carrying ocean carriers, including the method of payment and the amounts of appropriation and the amounts actually expended out of said appropriation, and finally any other information pertinent to these contracts available in your office.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered by the Senate and agreed to.

OVERDUE FEDERAL FARM LOANS

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, Senate Resolution No. 55 is similar to a resolution that has already passed at this session, it being for the same purpose as Senate Resolution 86, already adopted. I ask that Senate Resolution 55 be indefinitely postponed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be made.

ECONOMIC CONDITIONS IN THE UNITED STATES

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to address the Senate for a short time on a matter of importance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from New Jersey is recognized.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, Germany, through her action in printing paper marks as legal currency, not only destroyed all the savings of her middle classes but also destroyed the savings of many Germans all over the world, who, in their loyalty to their fatherland, believed that the mark would come back. I personally know of Germans in this country who drew their savings out of the savings banks and invested them in German marks, thereby losing the savings of a lifetime. As soon as any question of her ability to pay the reparation arose, naturally Germans, remembering what had occurred a few years before, seized the opportunity to get any moneys they had into foreign countries. This is one of the troubles with Germany to-day.

France, seeing the success Germany made, started printing francs until they went from 19 cents to 2 cents. They have been stabilized at 4 cents. This has wiped out 80 per cent of the savings of the middle class of Frenchmen, and has reduced the average wage of the French worker by a tremendous amount.

England, staggering under free trade in competition with these countries, with an enormous expenditure for the dole, and with the unwillingness of the labor organizations to meet in wages the competition of the workers of Germany and France, has been forced off the gold basis.

The pound has now gone from $4.86 down to $3.40, which is equivalent to a cut in salaries and wages and the dole of more than 30 per cent. Within a few days Japan has gone off the gold basis. The fall of her exchange will reduce wages in Japan and enable her to compete with other countries in the manufacture of cotton goods to sell to China, India, and other countries. America is practically the only free-gold country left. This means that foreign countries and foreign merchants from all over the world will wish to keep their surplus funds in American banks in our large cities, because they know that they can get their money back when called for without a large depreciation in exchange. This means for American enterprises money at reasonable rates if they can show earnings warranting their getting the money.

But, Mr. President, the earnings of our industries and the earnings of our railroads do not warrant at the present time lending them money. We have seen in the past that when a railroad went into the hands of a receiver it could be financed through receiver's certificates, so that to the people living along the line of the railroad it operated as usual. At present should many of our railroads go into the hands of receivers they will not be able to borrow money to operate the roads. A large section of our country may be left without any transportation facilities, the basis of the investments of the savings of our people, through our banks, our life-insurance companies and our fire-insurance companies, our savings institutions. United States bonds have decreased in value 12 per cent in two months, and if any large quantity should be offered will go off still further and probably ruin thousands of banks which are now solvent, and should United States bonds suffer another decline they will become insolvent. State and municipal bonds are now unsalable at anything like reasonable figures. Boston, whose credit is as high as that of any city in the United States, offered two small lots of bonds three days ago, one at 4½ per cent, which was taken, and the other at 4¼ per cent, for which no bid was received. Four and one-half per cent for a municipal bond, exempt from taxation, is equivalent to 5½ to 5¾ per cent for a taxable bond. Schenectady, in New York State, received no bids for her bonds. Likewise Mercer County, N. J., received no bids for bonds it offered. At the present time it is impossible to find a market for railroad bonds or industrial bonds owing to the fact that surpluses built up in good times have not declined as far or as fast as railroad bonds.

Our people, it has been estimated, have withdrawn currency from our banks to the amount of more than $2,000,000,000 dollars and locked it up in either safe-deposit boxes or hiding places.

How restore the confidence of our people? How make these investments safe for our institutions? These are some of the questions that are facing us and which should have the immediate attention of the Senate at the earliest moment.

As I stated the other day, we have been here since the 7th day of December, and as far as relieving this situation is concerned we have accomplished nothing. There is no Member of the Senate who is more anxious to go home than I, but I appeal to the Senators who have had more experience than I whether there is not some way by which we can do something to show that we realize these conditions and that we are going to do our utmost to relieve them.

NANCY H. ROUSE AND OTHERS

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Order of Business No. 9, Senate bill 1357, for the relief of Nancy H. Rouse and others.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). The clerk will read the bill for the information of the Senate.

The legislative clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Nancy H. Rouse, Clara H. Simmons, W. H. Hays, Hallie H. Hamilton, and Bradford P. Hays, owners of a certain farm consisting of 332 acres, more or less, near Camp Knox, in Hardin County, Ky., are hereby authorized to bring suit against the United States of America to recover damages, if any, for loss or losses which they may have sustained or suffered by reason of the establishment, construction, or maintenance of Camp Knox, in the State of Kentucky. Jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the Court of Claims of the United States or the District Court of the United States for the Western District of Kentucky to hear, consider, determine, and render judgment for the amount of any such damages, if any, as may be found to have been sustained or suffered by the above owners of said property, with the same right of appeal as in other cases, and notwithstanding any lapse of time or statute of limitations: Provided, That such action will be brought within one year from the date that this act shall become effective.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to immediate consideration?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, let us have an explanation of the bill.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, a bill exactly like this one passed the Senate at the last session and went to the House, where it was reported by the committee, but was caught in the jam at the end of the session and did not pass.

This bill would simply allow the owners of a farm in Hardin County, Ky., which lies close to Camp Knox to bring suit in the Court of Claims or in a United States district court for damages which they claim were inflicted on the farm by reason of the operation and maintenance of Camp Knox. It would simply allow them to bring the action and, if there were any damages, to recover.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have no objection to the bringing of a suit in the Court of Claims for this purpose, but the matter of allowing such suits to be brought in the district courts is still a matter of debate in committees which have considered this very question. It is still a matter of debate as to whether we ought to confer upon Federal courts, or State courts, for that matter, the right to entertain suits of this character. There is no objection to such a suit being brought in the Court of Claims.

Mr. BARKLEY. The owners of the farm involved are farmers in Kentucky. To require them to come to Washington to bring suit in the Court of Claims would amount to a denial of justice. Certainly a Federal court would not be unfair to the United States in the trial of a suit of this sort. I hope the Senator will not object, and that he will not insist on any amendment, because if the bill should be amended in the way he suggests, it would amount to killing the bill.

If these were people of wealth and influence who could come back and forth between Washington and their homes without inconvenience, I would have no objection, but under the circumstances I think they ought to be allowed to go into a court near their home in order to have this question passed on.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator that in most of the cases which are brought in the Court of Claims testimony of witnesses is taken at their homes, by deposition, and I think they suffer no disadvantage whatever by reason of having the suit brought in the Court of Claims. It seems to me that until Congress determines upon a policy we should not violate the rule which has been followed. I do not like to object, but I wish the Senator would confine the bill to the consideration of the case before the Court of Claims.

Mr. BARKLEY. I will say to the Senator that if I have another bill of this sort, I shall endeavor to comply with his request, but not in this case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah object?

Mr. KING. I will not object, but I think it is a very bad precedent, which we shall live to rue.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE CALENDAR

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, have we concluded the morning business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Morning business is completed, and the next order of business is the consideration of bills on the calendar.

Mr. McNARY. A number of Senators are absent to-day, and in view of that fact I ask unanimous consent that the consideration of the calendar be deferred until Monday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next order is the election of a President pro tempore, the unfinished business.

Mr. McNARY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Coolidge	Johnson	Reed
Austin	Costigan	Jones	Robinson, Ind.
Bailey	Couzens	Kean	Schall
Bankhead	Cutting	Kendrick	Sheppard
Barbour	Dale	Keyes	Shipstead
Barkley	Dickinson	King	Shortridge

Black	Fess	Lewis	Steiwer
Blaine	Fletcher	Logan	Thomas, Idaho
Borah	Frazier	McGill	Thomas, Okla.
Bratton	George	McKellar	Townsend
Brookhart	Glass	McNary	Trammell
Broussard	Goldsborough	Metcalf	Vandenberg
Bulkley	Gore	Morrison	Walcott
Bulow	Hale	Moses	Walsh, Mass.
Byrnes	Harris	Neely	Walsh, Mont.
Capper	Hastings	Norbeck	Waterman
Caraway	Hawes	Norris	Watson
Carey	Hayden	Nye	Wheeler
Connally	Hull	Pittman	White

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I wish to announce that the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE] has suffered a slight injury, and will not be able to be here to-day on that account.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question before the Senate is the election of a President pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRNES (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE]. If present that Senator would vote for Senator MOSES. If permitted to vote, I should vote for Senator PITTMAN.

Mr. NORRIS (when Mr. HOWELL's name was called). My colleague the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] is absent on official business. He is paired with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER]. If my colleague [Mr. HOWELL] were present, he would vote for Senator VANDENBERG, and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] would, no doubt, vote for Senator PITTMAN.

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). I understand that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] can not be here this afternoon. I am paired with him. I find that I can transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], which I do, and vote for Senator VANDENBERG.

Mr. LOGAN (when his name was called). May I inquire if the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. LOGAN. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS], who is necessarily absent. Therefore I withhold my vote. If he were present, the junior Senator from Pennsylvania would vote for Senator MOSES, and if I were permitted to vote I would vote for Senator PITTMAN.

Mr. McNARY (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON]. If he were present, he would vote for Senator PITTMAN, and if I were at liberty to vote I would vote for Senator MOSES.

Mr. METCALF (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS]. Were he here he would vote for Senator PITTMAN, and were I permitted to vote I should vote for Senator MOSES.

Mr. MORRISON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD], who is necessarily absent. If he were present, he would vote for Senator MOSES. If I were permitted to vote, I would vote for Senator PITTMAN.

Mr. MOSES (when his name was called). I continue to have a pair on this subject with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. REED (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], who, if present, would vote for Senator PITTMAN; and I, if permitted to vote, would vote for Senator MOSES.

Mr. WHEELER (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL]. I am not sure how he would vote on this matter, but if I were permitted to vote, I would vote for Senator PITTMAN.

The roll call was concluded.

COMMEMORATION OF TWO HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF GEORGE WASHINGTON'S BIRTH

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a concurrent resolution coming over from the House of Representatives, to which he calls the attention of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS]. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (H. Con. Res. 4), as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That a joint committee consisting of three Members of the House of Representatives and three Senators to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate, respectively, is authorized to make suitable arrangements for a fitting and proper celebration in the House of Representatives on February 22, 1932, of the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington.

Mr. FESS. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

SENATOR FROM ALABAMA

Mr. WATSON. I submit a resolution and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the resolution be reported for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 117), as follows:

Resolved, That the Select Committee on Senatorial Campaign Expenditures be, and it is hereby, requested to deliver to the Committee on Privileges and Elections all papers, correspondence, documents, and other data in its possession relating to the Heflin-Bankhead senatorial contest for such use as the committee may decide to make of it.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, there is no disagreement whatever between the so-called Nye committee and the subcommittee of the Committee on Privileges and Elections having in charge this contest. This resolution is offered by me merely in order to clarify the situation and make plain the authorization of the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, we on this side of the Chamber know the object of the resolution. It merely calls for this information to be turned over to the subcommittee of the Committee on Privileges and Elections for such use as that committee may desire to make of it. I understand that is the purpose of the resolution.

Mr. WATSON. Yes; that is the language of the resolution.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, in view of the expression by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], there is hardly occasion for any further word in the matter, except perhaps this, that the Select Committee on Senatorial Campaign Expenditures has at no time considered the reports made to it by its field investigators as final. A great deal of information involved in these reports represents merely the findings of investigators, which have not been substantiated in any degree by hearings conducted by the committee. So long as the reports and papers do not carry by reason of their surrender any stamp of official approval on the part of the select committee we have no objection to their being surrendered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The VICE PRESIDENT, as in executive session, laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting several nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

BEGINNING OF SENATORIAL TERM

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary at what probable date his committee will be able to take up the resolution which I submitted relative to the determination of the question as to when a United States Senator becomes a Member of this body?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator, I will say that the committee will meet on Monday, and I presume the resolution will come up at that time.

STABILIZATION OF CREDIT

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I should like to ask a member of the Banking and Currency Committee what is the program in regard to the proposed measure appropriating money to reinforce the credit of the Federal land banks, and also the measure providing for a credit corporation? What is being done in reference to those measures?

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, in the absence of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NORBECK], chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, I refer the question to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT].

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, the subcommittee appointed by the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency is meeting every day—morning and afternoon—hearing various witnesses representing the institutions affected by the bill to reestablish the finance corporation, namely, the railroads, the banks, the savings banks, and the insurance companies. We plan a series of hearings running through Tuesday afternoon. I hope we may be able to conclude the hearings by next week and that the subcommittee will then be able to report to the entire Committee on Banking and Currency, so that after the Senate reconvenes, following the Christmas recess, the Senate will have before it a bill which may be discussed.

Mr. SMITH. Does the Senator's statement have reference to the hundred million dollars proposed to be appropriated by a bill that is now being considered?

Mr. WALCOTT. No; it does not; that is a separate bill. We thought the other bill should have the right of way because of the emergency and because it was a larger bill with a broader base, providing a capitalization of $500,000,000 and authorizing the issuance, when and as needed, of debentures up to one and a half billion dollars guaranteed by the Federal Government. Does that answer the Senator's question?

Mr. SMITH. I was interested more particularly in the measure proposing to provide $100,000,000, which measure, I understand, the body at the other end of the Capitol is acting on to-day. Has the Senator any knowledge as to what is being done in reference to the fund proposed to reinforce the credit of the land banks?

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, may I say, in further answer, that the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY] is chairman of the subcommittee which has that matter in hand? I think they have had a hearing or two. I had a conversation with the Senator from Wyoming a moment ago after my talk with the Senator from South Carolina, in which he evinced his great interest in the subject, and I was informed that the subcommittee was not yet ready to make a report to the full committee, but that some further hearings would be required; that immediately after the reconvening of Congress those hearings would be held, and in a very short time the subcommittee would be ready to report to the full committee its conclusions.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I observe that if I understand the position taken by the Senator from Connecticut, as well as that taken by my friend from Indiana, the plan is to issue a billion and a half dollars or more of bonds. Thus we expect to pull ourselves out of this depression by our boot straps. There is no money in the Treasury; we will have to get it by taxation, and we will tax the people of the United States in order to assume the obligations of various corporations in the United States. It seems to me that by practicing economy rather than by issuing more bonds, more tax-exempt securities, we might be rendering a better service to the American people.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. McNARY. I move that the Senate adjourn, the adjournment being until Monday next at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 1 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, December 21, 1931, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 19, 1931

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Hear us as we look toward Thee, Heavenly Father, and make us men of sturdy codes of morality, of business sagacity, of fidelity, and of noble tenets of religion. Thou whose hands fling back and lift up, from whose fingers slip the stars, be Thou our light and our salvation. Lay restraining fingers upon the lips of unwisdom and hush rash words to silence. Almighty God, may we feel that there is something above us and beneath us that is fundamentally divine. Bless our city and Nation; help them both so that they may become the city and the country of God's love. Let us see Thy leaning face and be satisfied. In the name of Jesus our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that on the following date the President approved and signed a joint resolution of the House of the following title:

HOUSE OFFICE BUILDING COMMISSION

The SPEAKER. On the day the House was organized the Chair appointed Mr. POU, of North Carolina, and Mr. BACHARACH, of New Jersey, as members of the House Office Building Commission. In order to make a record of it and inform the House, the Chair will ask the Clerk to read the official designation.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pursuant to the provision of title 40, section 175, United States Code, the Chair appoints as members of the House Office Building Commission, to serve with himself, the following Members of the House of Representatives:

Mr. POU, of North Carolina.

Mr. BACHARACH, of New Jersey.

WAR POLICIES COMMISSION

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the Senate joint resolution (S. J. Res. 39) extending the time within which the War Policies Commission is required to submit its final report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a joint resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

Senate Joint Resolution 39

Joint resolution extending the time within which the War Policies Commission is required to submit its final report

Resolved, etc., That the time within which the War Policies Commission, created by Public Resolution No. 98, Seventy-first Congress, approved June 27, 1930, was required to submit its final report to the Congress be, and the same is hereby, extended 90 days.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

WILLIAM TYLER PAGE

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL]?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, 50 years ago to-day William Tyler Page began his service as a page boy with the House of Representatives. It falls to the lot of very few men to have such a long continued service as Mr. Page has given to this House. As a matter of fact, he has long since ceased to become an employee, but rather a part of the institution itself. He is really a traveling encyclopedia on everything that has taken place during all these years.

I know I express the feelings of the Members on both sides of the aisle when I extend to him our heartiest felicitations, and hope that he will be able to continue to render able, efficient, and intelligent service for many years. [Applause.]

I think we have recognized his services perhaps in a most practical way, and this was done when the gentleman from Illinois, the leader of the majority, offered a resolution recently, which created a permanent position for Mr. Page, and it received the unanimous approval of the Members of this House. We are glad to have had him with us. We recognize that he is an outstanding, loyal American citizen. May he long live. [Applause.]

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House of Representatives, I should feel remiss, indeed, if I did not express my appreciation, and that of my State, for the fact that William Tyler Page is a resident and native of the State of Maryland, the great free State.

Mr. William Tyler Page, a descendant of President Tyler and Carter Braxton, a "signer," has been here for 50 years, so long that we scarcely regard him as a member of any particular party or as one allied to any particular State, but as the common possession of the Union and of the citizens thereof. We are proud that he is the author of the American Creed [applause], known to every school child in this great

United States. We are proud that it followed the writing of the Star-Spangled Banner by Francis Scott Key, another native of Maryland and great American citizen.

I am very glad, indeed, that this House has provided a permanent position for Mr. Page. He is deserving of it. No man is better informed in House procedure than he. Some distinguished citizen has jokingly said that when they opened the door of the Capitol one morning Mr. William Tyler Page was found on the doorstep, that he was taken in, and has been here ever since. [Laughter and applause.]

I heard Tyler Page relate that one day late in the afternoon he was sitting in the lobby on one of the long sofas "just thinking," no one around, when along came Champ Clark, the great Speaker and Democrat. When he reached Page he turned suddenly and facing him, said, "Tyler, they tell me you were born in this Capitol." "No," said Tyler Page, "I was not, but I shall do as John Quincy Adams did, I shall die here." John Quincy Adams died in a room of the House of Representatives occupied by Page when Clerk. Everyone knows Page and admires him for his ability, his courtesy, and his friendship.

A speech on William Tyler Page would be incomplete without his American Creed:

I believe in the United States of America as a government of the people, by the people, for the people; whose just powers are derived from the consent of the governed; a democracy in a republic; a sovereign Nation of many sovereign States; a perfect Union, one and inseparable, established upon those principles of freedom, equality, justice, and humanity for which American patriots sacrificed their lives and fortunes.

I therefore believe it is my duty to my country to love it, to support its Constitution, to obey its laws, to respect its flag, and to defend it against all enemies.

ILLINOIS COAL ON THE WATERWAY

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a speech made by my colleague, the Hon. CLAUDE V. PARSONS, before the Mississippi Valley Association, Statler Hotel, St. Louis, Mo., November 24, 1931.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The speech is as follows:

Mr. Chairman and members of the association, I should like to take advantage of this opportunity on behalf of the Saline River Improvement Association, to thank the officers and members of the Mississippi Valley Association for the many courtesies they have shown our members and the efforts and interest exerted in favor of the canalization of the Saline River in order to place Illinois coal on the waterways. The slogan of this association, "All for one and one for all," exhibits the spirit of men of wealth, power, and influence, located North, South, East, and West, who seek to bring to the Mississippi Valley and its tributaries a development that nature partly denied this great inland empire and place it in fair competition with the remainder of America.

There is an old adage "History repeats itself," and no evolution in any age has proven this statement better than the waterways and railroads. In the discovery, exploration, and colonization of America the rivers furnished the arteries of transportation and the earliest settlements were made along the streams. It was more than 300 years after the discovery of America before many inland settlements were made. After the invention of the steamboat, which antedated the railroads by a generation, immigration and settlement took on a new life in the Middle West. It was the quickest and most convenient mode of travel. Being a monopoly unto itself, steamboat owners sought to fill their coffers at the expense of the pioneer. Necessity, as the mother of invention, brought about the invention of the locomotive, which added a new incentive to the winning of the West, and the battle was on between the steamboats and the railroads. Time and speed were the elements that made railway transportation popular, and as the miles of steel were laid down, first to the Mississippi Valley and later across the mountains to the Pacific, inland towns and cities sprang up by the hundreds. Engineers and men of finance saw in the railroad an unlimited possibility for wealth, and through Government subsidies and land grants a network of tracks covered this Union. History has repeated itself. The railroads, having filled their treasury from the fat of the land, occupy the same position to-day that the steamboat and river transportation occupied three-quarters of a century ago.

My subject, "Put Illinois Coal on the Waterways," is a challenge not only to the people of our great State but also to the peoples in the States north and west of the Mississippi River. Nature endowed that section of land north of the Ohio, east of the Mississippi, and south of the Lakes with what appears to be an unlimited supply of the black diamond. Geologists tell us that it came about because of the great glaciers which inhabited our land in the unknown past. Most of the territory comprising more than 56,000 square miles is underlaid with one or more seams of bituminous coal. Tests that have been conducted in recent years have shown it to be among the very best bituminous coal in the world. There is an area known as the southern Illinois coal field; another, the southwestern; another, the central; and another, the northern Illinois coal field. Wherever you drive over the great hard-road system of Illinois you see dotted on the horizon here and there tipples of this mighty industry.

What I shall say to-day will be in reference to all Illinois coal, but particularly with the section known as the southern Illinois coal field. The counties of Franklin, Williamson, Saline, Gallatin, Hamilton, and White constitute the section that is to be immediately served by the proposed improvement of the Saline River. By referring to the table one will note that in these six counties, located within a radius of 25 miles of the proposed canal, there remains in the bowels of the earth more than 22,000,000,000 tons of coal. This is one and one-fourth times as much bituminous coal as has been mined in the United States in all of the history of America. If all the coal that had been mined in this country could be placed in one mountain and a like amount mined in southern Illinois placed into another mountain there would still remain underground in southern Illinois enough coal, at the rate southern Illinois has been mining in the past, to keep the industry going for another hundred years. The average amount of coal mined in the United States annually during the past 17 years is a little over 500,000,000 tons. There is enough coal in southern Illinois to furnish the supply of America at that rate for almost 50 years. The average amount of coal mined in the entire State of Illinois for the past 17 years is about 64,000,000 tons annually. The supply in southern Illinois is sufficient to last 344 years if the mines in central and northern Illinois did not produce a lump. To estimate it in a financial way, we have enough coal in this section, if mined and sold at the average retail price, to pay off all of the national debts of every civilized nation of the globe, place $50,000,000,000 in the Treasury of the United States, and, in addition, provide sufficient funds to make a 9-foot channel in every stream of America from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from the Great Lakes to the Gulf. Therefore you can readily understand why the people of Illinois desire to put their coal on the waterways.

In the period of 17 years which elapsed between 1913 and 1930 the total production of bituminous coal in the United States rose from 478,000,000 tons in 1913 to 579,000,000 tons in 1918 and receded to 461,000,000 tons in 1930. In the same period the total coal production in the State of Illinois rose from 61,000,000 tons to 89,000,000 tons in 1918, and receded to 53,000,000 tons in 1930. The actual reduction in coal in the United States from 1913 to 1930 was 17,000,000 tons. In the same period the production in Illinois dropped 8,000,000 tons, or more than half of the total reduction in the United States. In the same period West Virginia's coal production rose from 71,000,000 tons in 1913 to 120,000,000 tons in 1930. The Kentucky fields rose from less than 20,000,000 tons in 1913 to more than 50,000,000 tons in 1930. The increased activity and production in these two States are due more or less directly to water rates and a combination of water and rail rates. These figures are significant and reflect the condition of stagnation in the southern Illinois mining field.

I direct your attention to the principal coal fields in the United States: Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Illinois, Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana, and Alabama. These States produce more than five-sixths of all the coal mined in America. At the same time, I direct your attention to a group of States served directly and in close proximity to these coal fields. Twenty-four States of the Union centering in and around these coal fields comprise about one-fourth of the land area in the United States and three-fourths of the population. The 1930 census gives these same 24 States 67.95 per cent of the area, population, and volume of wholesale trade in the States of the Union served by the coal-mining centers east of the Mississippi River.

Wholesale trade in the United States. These States comprise the territory east of the Mississippi River and the two tiers of States just south of the Mason-Dixon line east to the Atlantic Ocean. The other 24 States comprise three-fourths of the land area of the Nation, only one-fourth of the population, and less than one-third of the wholesale trade of the country. It is safe to say that wherever you find the wealth, industry, manufacturing, and trade you will also find the market and consumption for coal. There are other coal fields west of the Mississippi River but small in comparison to the great undeveloped areas in the State of Illinois. Pennsylvania coal is used east and northeast; West Virginia, Ohio, and Indiana coal is used in the Central West and in the Lake port area as well as some of Illinois coal. The markets for Kentucky coal, by virtue of the fact they lie on or near the waterways, are both south and west. By a glance at the map of the United States it is quite apparent that Illinois can not meet the competition east and northeast, because that market belongs to the fields I have just enumerated. Where, then, are the future markets for Illinois coal? They lie in the North, the West, and the far Northwest. These coal deposits are closer by rail and water than any other of the great coal fields of the Nation. And it is for the purpose of reaching these markets both by rail and water that we are seeking to put Illinois coal on the waterways.

To show the unfair competition because of the discrimination of rates I invite your attention to the map showing the movement of coal from southern Illinois to Minnesota, the Dakotas, Nebraska, Iowa, and Wisconsin.

Movement of coal from southern Illinois to—	1923	1930	Loss
Minnesota	1,792,394	478,262	1,314,132
Dakotas	223,906	134,299	89,607
Nebraska	420,017	350,219	69,798
Iowa	2,569,322	1,982,444	586,878

Freight rates on coal from southern Illinois to—	Per ton
St. Louis	$1.30
Chicago	1.90
Davenport	2.34
Kansas City	3.38
Lincoln	3.80
Omaha	$3.62
Sioux City	4.15
St. Paul	3.75

In 1923 we sent into that area almost 7,000,000 tons of coal. In 1930 we sent only 3,704,000 tons, or a loss of more than 3,000,000 tons, or one-third of the total loss of tonnage in the State of Illinois. Our loss in the southern Illinois coal fields in these five States was one-sixth of the entire reduction of mining of bituminous coal in the United States. One of the principal reasons for this loss of market is the discriminatory freight rates which show $1.30 a ton to St. Louis, a rate of $3.38 to Kansas City, $3.62 to Omaha, and $3.75 to the Twin Cities. It is that market and other markets which we hope to regain and which by right belong to the State of Illinois because of its strategic location.

An important event occurred in St. Paul, Minn., October 2, last, when the first shipment of southern Illinois coal arrived by water at the municipal barge terminal in that city. This coal was shipped by rail to East St. Louis, loaded on barges, and towed to St. Paul. Even with the combination water and rail rates the cost of delivery charges were 45 cents per ton less than a straight rail rate. This feat answers fully the question, "What is a 9-foot channel in the upper Mississippi worth to the Twin Cities and the Northwest in general?" It also proves our contention that Illinois coal should be placed on the waterways. If a saving of 45 cents per ton is made on coal by a combination rail and water rate, how much more saving will be realized on a straight water rate?

The following table shows the basis of cost per ton of coal from the southern Illinois coal fields through the proposed Saline River Canal down the Ohio and up the Mississippi to St. Louis, a distance of 327 miles, which is as follows:

One towboat: Cost of carrying charges, insurance, maintenance, and operation, for 30 days or 720 towboat hours	$10,000
Ten barges ($50,000×10=$500,000): Interest 5 per cent, depreciation 5 per cent, insurance and maintenance 3 per cent.
Cost per month ($\frac{1}{12}$ of 13 per cent on $500)	5,400
Total	15,400

Time of one tow moving 12,000 tons of coal and returning empties, 180 hours.

Coal delivered per month: 720÷180=4, 4×12,000=48,000 tons.

Cost of delivery:	Per ton
Transportation ($13,400÷48,000) per cent	32
Fire and marine insurance on cargo do	3
Loading cents	15
Unloading per cent	10

The present rail rate from the southern Illinois fields to St. Louis is $1.30 per ton. The cost on the waterway at 60 cents per ton makes a saving of 70 cents or a total of $8,400 for every tow of coal transported on the waterways. We would only have to find a new market for 1,200,000 tons of coal to effect a saving of $840,000 annually which in 10 years will amortize not only the cost of equipment but the cost of the canal in its entirety.

But some may say that you are injuring the railroads, taking away from them their revenue and assisting in their destruction. Others will say that you are seeking to take the markets of other coal fields and thereby contribute to the unemployment situation. Gentlemen, my contention is that with the placing of Illinois coal on the waterways you will make the use of coal so cheap that new uses will be discovered for its consumption and that ultimately it will bring about a revolution in the industrial world. Coal is the largest national resource that we have in the Union. No nation has been destroyed until its immediate national resources were exhausted or its people overcome with graft and stagnation through industrial paralysis. I am not a scientist or a chemist, but I fully believe that the greatest field in which chemists may work to-day is the coal industry. Find new uses for the black diamond, shear it of its dust and its dirt and its nonessential elements and you will bring back to the coal industry the greatest period of development and prosperity that it has ever known.

I have no fight with the railroads. I believe in the present stability and the future development of that great artery of transportation that has made the desert blossom as the rose. No one stands more ready than I to enact wise legislation, which will enable them to compete with those agencies that have taken their passenger, mail, and freight traffic, in order to restore the revenue to the railroad so they can carry on. For three-quarters of a century they had a "wide berth" without competition. But the railroads must realize now that they have competition in the field. Every employee, from the local operator to the railway president, must direct their activities to meet competition as the individuals do in other lines of industry. With the completion of the deep waterways we will place at the disposal of the railroad, terminals and distribution centers, which will give them more tonnage to haul throughout the Middle West and the far West than they have ever enjoyed before. No personal ambition or one line of industry can stand in the way of progress. Westward, ever westward, the sway of empire builds its way. I am for the program of the Mississippi Valley Association. I believe the Federal Government should do it and do it now, and with its completion we will not only have an inland waterway, but an island inland waterway. Put Illinois coal upon this waterway and not only we in Illinois but the States west and northwest, who will secure cheaper and better coal, and the industries that will dot their land will sing the song of Illinois with a new fervor.

"By the rivers' gently flowing,
Illinois, Illinois;
With thy laden commerce floating,
Illinois, Illinois;
To the markets north and west
Goes our coal, the very best,
Bring prosperity to its crest,
Illinois, Illinois;
Waterways provide the test,
Illinois."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a resolution adopted by Bay Council, No. 51, United Commercial Travellers of America, at Bay City, Mich.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks as indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, although I am a member of the United Commercial Travellers of America, I shall object to the insertion of this resolution.

FLOOD CONTROL AND NAVIGATION

Mr. DRIVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting the address made by my colleague, Mr. WILSON, of Louisiana, at the recent meeting of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress on the subject of the relation of navigation to flood control.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DRIVER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Hon. RILEY J. WILSON, Representative in Congress from Louisiana, at the Twenty-seventh Annual Convention of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress:

Mr. President, ladies and gentlemen of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, it is always a genuine pleasure to have the opportunity to participate in the work of this organization. The objects and purposes of those who have planned and worked for the improvement to completion of the rivers and harbors of the Nation have been and are now to provide an adequate and dependable navigable waterway system for the purpose of transportation.

Our waterways—rivers, harbors, lakes, and canals—comprise a great natural asset of inestimable value and potential service to the entire Nation.

The realization of this service depends upon the opportunity to use continuously connected and coordinated channels and harbors. The progress made in the last few years entitles you to the continued cooperation and support of all, be they in official life or engaged in industrial and agricultural activities. I feel that we have reached the point where we should give greater consideration to the relation of flood control to navigation. The people of the Mississippi Valley appreciate the assitance given by the National Rivers and Harbors Congress and other waterway organizations to secure the enactment of legislation for the control of flood waters in the alluvial valley of the Mississippi River. I feel that I can express a like appreciation for those interested in the Sacramento River of California. Practically every inland waterway presenting the problem of improvement for navigation to a certain degree presents the problem of flood control that will aid and secure dependable all-the-year-round navigation of the stream affected.

Take, for instance, the Sacramento River of California, which was embraced in the flood control act of 1917. The work for the control of the floods of that stream, coordinated with that for navigation purposes, has in addition to protecting against floods made possible uninterrupted navigation for a distance of 150 miles, from the mouth of the river to the city of Sacramento.

For the improvement of the Ohio River for navigation from Pittsburgh to Cairo the Federal Government has spent about $150,000,000. On the Allegheny and Monongahela Rivers, which by their confluence at Pittsburgh form the Ohio River, a serious problem in relation to flood control is presented. This problem is such that it sometimes endangers to a large extent the safety of the city of Pittsburgh. In low-water stages the channel of the Ohio River becomes inadequate to handle the prospective tonnage. According to the report of the Flood Commission of Pittsburgh perfect security to that city could be obtained by impounding the floods on the Allegheny and Monongahela which would be released during low-water periods and guarantee uninterrupted navigation all the way to Cairo.

The report and recommendations of the Flood Commission of Pittsburgh has not been adopted and followed for economic reasons. In other words, the cost for the completion of the reservoirs for water storage at the sources of the Allegheny and Monongahela Rivers was too great, but when we consider the possibilities of flood damages to that area and the importance of uninterrupted traffic from Pittsburgh to Cairo and to the Gulf and the markets of the world, I believe a reconsideration of that phase of the problem would be justified.

Take the Mississippi River system as a whole. The mileage of navigable waterways which we have under consideration for improvement for the purposes of navigation, is about 14,000 miles. On practically every tributary as well as the main channel along with the improvement for navigation arises the question of flood control. Wherever this work can be coordinated to secure valuable results that policy should be adopted. The objects and purposes of flood control and navigation are in a general way the same. The declaration of Congress as a basis for the passage of the first flood control act of 1917 was as follows:

"The control of the Mississippi River is a national problem, and the preservation of the depth of its water for the purpose of navigation, the building of levees to maintain the integrity of its channel, and the prevention of the overflow of the land and its consequent devastation, resulting in the interruption of interstate commerce, the disorganization of the mail service, and the enormous loss of life and property, impose an obligation which alone can be discharged by the General Government."

This declaration applies to other streams embraced within our comprehensive plans and policy of improvement for the purposes of navigation, and especially those composing the Mississippi River system—tributaries to the main channel.

Many of the members of this organization, cities, chambers of commerce, boards of trade, and individuals represented and present here to-day are looking forward with the same interest toward improvement for flood control as for the purposes of navigation. According to my judgment, the announced objects and purposes of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress for national service can well be applied to and coordinated with those of flood control. I quote the announcement taken from the proceedings of 1926 in which it is stated that the National Rivers and Harbors Congress has "as its ultimate goal, through the adoption of such a broad and comprehensive policy, the development of a unified, interrelated, and connected national system of waterways, including inland rivers and intracoastal canals which, supplementing and correlated with railways and highways, would provide the foundation for and guarantee the future economic security and supremacy of the United States."

I submit that such a goal can best be achieved and maintained by linking improvements for navigation with the work for the control of flood waters wherever practical. This will prevent devastation and destruction of life and property and at the same time improve and preserve the integrity of channels. The most important work on the greatest problem we have in this connection is on the Mississippi River from Cape Girardeau to the Head of the Passes. I believe that all engineers with experience agree that the work for flood control on this project in the past has been an aid to navigation.

Up until the passage of the flood control act of 1917 the Federal Government had taken and maintained the position that its interest and jurisdiction on the Mississippi River and its alluvial valley was for the purpose of navigation only, and consented to and engaged in the work of flood control only to such an extent as it would be an aid to navigation.

We are familiar with the complaints that were made to the effect that confinement and control of the waters in the channel of the river had caused the bed of the river to rise, and had an adverse effect on navigation, and that such conditions existed on all rivers where like flood-control work had been constructed, especially the Danube and the Po, but investigations made by engineers prove such reports to be unfounded and that on the other hand the channels had been improved, deepened, and the carrying capacity for flood waters increased, as well as preserved more dependable channels for navigation.

In this connection I call attention to the testimony of Maj. J. A. Ockerson, member of the Mississippi River Commission, before the Committee on Commerce of the United States Senate, March 3, 1914. This testimony showed that 41,000 soundings were made between the Arkansas River and Vicksburg, Miss., a distance of 200 miles, and from Vicksburg, Miss., to Donaldsonville, La., a distance of 272 miles, covering a period, as I recall, of about 12 years. I quote from his testimony: "The result of this investigation in a general way was that the capacity of the bed of the stream to carry flood waters was materially increased; that the crest of the bars had been materially lowered. The tendency is toward a bed of more uniform depth and of a larger capacity." Major Ockerson had also made an examination of the Danube and the Po, with like results.

I am glad to know that an examination is now under way under the direction of the Chief of Engineers on the Mississippi River from the Arkansas River to the Head of the Passes to secure additional and more scientific information for an increased carrying capacity of the main channel for flood waters and its improvement for greater safety in navigation. One engineer has described the Mississippi as "a lawless stream," but all agree that it fights for a uniform channel. If it can be found that the enlargement and deepening of this channel can secure a continued enlargement and uniform carrying capacity for its flood waters, it will be a wonderful relief in safety to the people of Arkansas, Mississippi, and Louisiana, and will result in a saving of millions of dollars of expenditures by the Federal Government.

The Atchafalaya River in Louisiana presents a like problem except that it is subject to more rapid change. Reports of our engineers show that within the past 10 years in certain sections its carrying capacity has increased more than 30 per cent. If the flood waters entering the Atchafalaya could be put under more direct control and a more rapid discharge provided into the Gulf of Mexico, this would open up a way for the perfect improvement for navigation and a substantial and effective relief for devastating floods.

There are many other instances of equal importance, and I appeal to this association that earnest consideration be given to the question of coordinating the work of flood control with that of navigation. I suggest further that if a bond issue is proposed for the execution and completion of projects now approved or hereafter authorized for navigation that like consideration be given to flood control.

ECONOMIC SITUATION

Mr. MOORE of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing the address of the senior Senator from Ohio [Senator FESS] before the Republican National Committee last Tuesday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Senator FESS, of Ohio, chairman of the Republican National Committee, before the Republican National Committee on Tuesday, December 15, 1931:

ADDRESS OF SENATOR FESS, OF OHIO

The evils of war are never confined to human suffering on the battle front nor within the time of the duration of the conflict. They extend to an economic breakdown which must inevitably follow the contest and will persist over a long period. Mr. Balfour well expressed the inevitable results when he said, "How glad we ought to be that we did not lose since victory is so costly."

Twelve years after the close of the world's most sanguine conflict we record its aftermath in an overturn of governments representing one-half the population of the earth, where the voice of the people has given way to that of the dictator. We have seen well-established monetary systems abandoned, followed by an almost complete breakdown of credit structure. Maximum employment stressed by the necessities of war has given way to the most widespread unemployment known in our modern system of civilization. Statesmen the world over are put to the most supreme test to meet and solve these consequences of war. Fully as high a type of leadership is demanded in this after-war peace period as is required in the arena of military conflict.

In addition to the actual destruction of wealth incident to war there are inevitable dislocations in every avenue of productive activity. These dislocations suspend the economic forces of a prosperous people. While our own country has not suffered in the degree that the peoples of other countries have, the inevitable results denote an interruption of industry with a more or less deranged credit system and consequent large unemployment. Fortunately for this country we still have all the basic elements of a great and prosperous people awaiting coordination into a sound business organization. We have the same resources in agriculture, with our fields just as productive as ever before. We have our transportation system intact, disturbed mainly by an increase of transportation agencies. We have ample bank resources with abundant funds, and the greatest gold supply in the history of the world awaiting an opportunity to be safely employed. We have our manufacturing plants capable of producing, not only our needs but those of the world, embarrassed only by an overexpansion under the stress of war's demands. We have the same industrial and business leadership in the organization of industry that we had before the war. We have the same skilled labor with the ability to produce per unit beyond that of any labor in the world. These elements, the foundation of a great and prosperous people, are all intact awaiting an opportunity for activity.

In every crisis where unemployment and suffering have resulted, no general organized effort was ever undertaken for relief. The charitable agencies in each community were left under their own impulse to take such steps as the demands of humanity would impress upon them. How different is the Hoover method. Back in midsummer, long before acute suffering had overtaken us, he called to his aid one of the outstanding men of business and placed upon his shoulders the task of taking the lead in organizing a nation-wide system of caring for the unemployed. At this time, with the opening of winter, this organization, through its efforts in stimulating human agencies throughout America, has this problem well in hand and is meeting every call of humanity with the largest output of human relief from the American people yet recorded in the history of mankind.

If the President succeeds in nothing more than preventing great suffering during this period of depression, and preventing the advocates of the dole seizing upon it as the occasion to fasten upon our country through their widespread sympathy for the unemployed a system with which England is struggling, that service alone would be found to distinguish him in history. Fortunately he is having support in this effort of vast numbers of organizations, including the American Federation of Labor.

Our President, recognizing the imminence of a breakdown of our purchasing power, which in the last analysis is the best test of the welfare of the people, mobilized at once the forces of the production of wealth, including not only the representatives of labor and capital, but the leadership of special units of industry, and secured an agreement that as far as it was possible the program of betterments and improvements would not be lessened, but if possible increased, and the wage scale sustained. An immediate result of this agreement is the proof of its wisdom in the almost total absence of labor troubles, with a better spirit and feeling between labor and capital than has been displayed in our history.

Supplemental to this proposal, the administration launched upon a constructive program including not only construction under the Federal Government but also under State and municipality. The Federal share of this program shows an increase of construction from $250,000,000 to at least $750,000,000 of public funds. This is well matched by State and municipality in the interest of absorbing the maximum of unemployment.

While our foreign relations have been the very best, with our country not only at peace with all the world but a leader in the resuscitation from the effects of the World War, there has been much concern about the effect upon our own people of forces that are now operating beyond the sea. Our country's efforts to relieve the staggering burdens under which the peoples of the world are suffering are well displayed in what was done in the Washington Conference of 1921 and 1922, the Kellogg peace pact, and the London Naval Conference. This policy is further being extended in such influence as can be rendered in the Geneva Conference looking to further reduction of these burdens.

War's exactions have been so impelling that obligations already entered into may fail, in which case default will result. Such a collapse on the part of any great government in Europe would have an appalling effect upon the people of our own country. The interrelation between governments to-day is so close that a default on the part of one government would be felt among the people of all governments. This would especially be true in the case of a breakdown in Germany, to whom American funds were loaned for purposes of readjustment after the war. A default in meeting these obligations would further disturb our credit system by absorbing much of the liquid assets in our larger banks, which otherwise could be loaned to productive industry. To avoid such a calamity the President sought, with commendable expedition, the approval of the leadership of both political parties to a moratorium, allowing a period for readjustment. The approval of this executive request was not only world-wide but was stupendous in its immediate results.

The steady rise in the price current of commodities on the stock exchange, due largely on the one hand to the abundance of funds available in the land, and on the other to the speculative spirit that was consuming our people, continued its dizzy heights until the limit was reached, when the crash came and the price current precipitately took the downward course. As loans were made during the upward trend on too high a basis of security, these securities in the downward trend went so low that neither could obligations be paid in full, nor renewals be made on the same basis, and a condition of frozen assets throughout the United States found almost every bank in the country heavily loaded with long-time obligations secured by real estate at too high a figure. In time a situation like this forced banks, perfectly sound, with abundant assets, but unrealizable, to close.

In order to meet such a situation, which was an inevitable result of war's inflation, the President secured the cooperation of leaders of finance to form a credit corporation, with a reservoir of a half billion dollars from which funds could be secured to forestall further closings incident to a fright that induced depositors to withdraw their funds. The theory of this proposal was that the mere creation of such a pool would obviate any great demand since the depositor, knowing that the bank could secure necessary funds, would not think of withdrawing his deposits. This theory has been notably demonstrated by the very small call for the subscriptions to the pool, and the very small number of solicitations of banks for aid. It is to be hoped that with this fear removed these funds may be applied to the sound banks that have been closed.

As a further relief of the credit system the President has recommended a home-mortgage bank system to deal with the long-time obligations secured by real estate as the Federal Reserve Board deals with commercial paper. If Congress will speedily react in giving this remedial legislation, there is no doubt that the frozen-asset situation will be substantially relieved at a very early date.

It has been also suggested that there be liberalization of the Federal reserve system so as to enlarge in a degree the eligible paper to be discounted by that system.

One of the great industries of America, the prosperity of which must be the prosperity of the people, is the steam-line transportation, which in the main must remain the chief reliance for this service. The financing of this great enterprise has become a problem. There are other industries that may be in a similar situation.

The President is recommending something like the revival of the War Finance Corporation to operate during the emergency as that corporation operated during the war to supply relief for the time being to these great industries which are temporarily disturbed.

The administration has taken the longest step yet taken in giving governmental relief to agriculture in an effort to place agriculture on an equality with other industries.

While in former crises the President then at the head of the Government was inclined to leave the forces undisturbed to work themselves out, President Hoover has felt that the crisis through which the world is now passing is so widespread and its menaces are so imminent that drastic treatment is demanded, and he has supplied a type of leadership without precedent in American history. His efforts are as wide as the suffering of his people. His plans are invested with the purpose of relief. Were it not that we are approaching a presidential campaign, Mr. Hoover would be the most widely supported public man in his efforts for relief here, which are no less distinguished than his efforts in Belgium during the war.

It is regrettable that in the exigencies of party politics political leaders are inclined to employ a depression as a basis for utilizing the unthinking disaffected who have been taught to look to the Government for relef. It offers an opportunity on a partisan basis to seize upon the depression as the one chance of riding into office. The great temptation will induce leaders to withhold support which otherwise would be generously given.

An intelligent public opinion must be formed. It is the purpose of this committee to assist in convincing the disaffected that the President is not responsible for the spots on the sun, the storms at sea, the droughts on land, nor the numerous epidemics that frequently sweep sections of the country. Our business is to place Mr. Hoover in the minds of the public where his stupendous efforts and brilliant leadership justify. This stage reached, there will be no doubt about the results of the contest next November.

Seen from the long-distance point of view, our country is riding the waves of an economic storm. It is not unlike the best-built ship overtaken by a storm at sea. The decks are washed by the waves, the furniture of the ship thrown topsy-turvy, the passengers confined to their staterooms, and the crew bewildered as the storm smashes through the portholes. In the midst of the confusion both passengers and crew are aware that on the bridge stands the pilot with a poised brain and steady hand. He is directing the ship in her course. Her speed is somewhat lowered. Her machinery is being tested, but both passengers and crew have confidence that under this leadership the ship will safely reach the port. Such is the leadership of President Hoover, and such will be the confidence of the American people when they fully realize the elements at play through which the ship of state is now passing.

RECESS OVER THE HOLIDAYS

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois offers a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Concurrent Resolution 5

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That when the two Houses adjourn on Tuesday, December 22, 1931, they stand adjourned until 12 o'clock meridian, Monday, January 4, 1932.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

SOVIET RUSSIA

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a radio speech I made against the recognition of Soviet Russia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a radio speech he made on the subject of Soviet Russia. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech made over radio station WOR, November 22, 1931:

I am opposed to the diplomatic recognition of Soviet Russia, because there is no sound reason for the recognition of any foreign nation unless that nation abides by the principles and accepted practice of international law. I am opposed to the recognition of Soviet Russia by the United States, because such recognition presupposes a friendly government and friendly relationship, which do not and can not exist.

The recognition of the Soviet Government, controlled by the Russian Communist Party, which seeks to sow seeds of class hatred, atheism, and world revolution in every noncommunist country, would be a lie to international law and to official diplomatic relations.

Former Secretary of State Elihu Root summed up the American position in the following able and concise statement: "The recognition of one government by another is not a mere courtesy. It is an act having a definite and specific meaning, and it involves an acceptance by the recognizing government of the principles, purposes, and avowed intentions of the recognized government as being in conformity with the rules which govern the conduct of civilized nations toward each other. For the United States to recognize Russia would be to publicly acknowledge that the avowed purpose of the present Russian Government to overthrow by force our system of government is consistent with international friendship. Of course, that would be a lie."

I accepted the invitation to speak or debate against the recognition of Soviet Russia with considerable reluctance, as I regard the issue merely an academic one, in view of the steadfast and consistent policy of nonrecognition adopted by every administration from that of Woodrow Wilson to that of Herbert Hoover.

There is not a crumb of comfort to the recognitionists in the clear-cut statements made by the various Secretaries of State, beginning with Hon. Bainbridge Colby, when he said, "The existing régime in Russia is based on the negation of every principle of honor and good faith and every usage and convention underlying the whole structure of international law, the negation, in short, of every principle upon which it is possible to base harmonious and trustful relations, whether of nations or of individuals."

Charles Evans Hughes stated in 1923, when he was Secretary of State, "There would seem to be at this time no reason for negotiations. The American Government, as the President said in his message to the Congress, is not proposing to barter away its principles. Most serious is the continued propaganda to overthrow the institutions of this country. This Government can enter no negotiations until these efforts directed from Moscow are abandoned."

It seems to me that there is no room for argument, the American people will not compromise with any attempts of foreign governments to meddle or interfere with our domestic institutions and, of course, will not tolerate the revolutionary activities and the vicious and diseased propaganda of the Communist Internationale, with headquarters at Moscow, directed at our civil liberties, our free institutions, and our republican form of Government.

I decline to argue whether the Soviet Government is strictly responsible for the acts of the Communist Internationale, further than to quote Zinovieff, the former head of the Communist Internationale, who said at the fourth congress of the Internationale regarding its relation to the Soviet Government: "It would be laughable to ask who has the advantages and who is the subject and who is the object. It is the foundation and roof of the same building; one belongs to the other." The Russian Communist Party, the Soviet Government, and the Red Internationale have interlocking directorates, and all three take their orders from the political bureau headed by Stalin and Molitov. Their fundamental aim is world revolution and the establishment of the dictatorship of the proletariat throughout the world by force and violence.

There is an admirable trait that any political party in America can take from the Communist Party, and that is that they always adhere strictly to their party platform. That is one characteristic that we can admire in the Communist Party, as it has stood steadfastly for 15 years for its original principles of world revolution, class hatred, and hatred of God.

The committee appointed by the House of Representatives, of which I had the honor to be chairman, to investigate communist activities and propaganda in the United States, was convinced that the most effective way of combating communism in the United States was to give the fullest possible publicity to the fundamental principles and aims of the communists, which are the same throughout the world, as they are not likely to prove acceptable to any considerable number of American citizens unless camouflaged by extraneous issues, such as unemployment insurance, protection of foreign born, or other current topics that have nothing to do with communism.

Communism is easy to define, as the aims and purposes of the communist in Moscow, Berlin, New York, Los Angeles, and Pekin are the same, and all take their orders from the Communist Internationale, with headquarters in Moscow, and obey them implicitly and are apparently proud of their allegiance to the red flag and the Soviet Union. What is the definition of communism? Communism is a world-wide political organization advocating (1) hatred of God and all forms of religious beliefs; (2) destruction of private property and inheritance; (3) promotion of the bitterest kind of class hatred; (4) use of revolutionary propaganda through the Communist Internationale, stirring up communist activities in foreign countries in order to cause strikes, riots, sabotage, and industrial unrest; (5) destruction of all forms of representative or democratic government, including civil liberties, such as freedom of speech, of the press, of assembly, and trial by jury; (6) the ultimate and final objective is by means of world revolution to establish the dictatorship of the so-called proletariat into a world union of soviet socialist republics, with the world capital at Moscow.

Under the Declaration of Independence, the American people have the acknowledged right to revolution whenever there are sufficient evils, abuses, and injustices under our form of government to warrant such a course. Happily, we have no need to consider such a possibility. We have the right to put on our own little revolution any time we want, but the American people do not propose to have a revolution made to order for us by any foreign power and particularly by Stalin and the Communist International at Moscow.

We do not intend to recognize Soviet Russia, because we do not propose to have the Soviet consulates established in all the industrial cities of the United States to become nests of communist propaganda and class hatred. We are not afraid of such revolutionary propaganda in our midst, but we do not propose to admit it any more than we would leprosy, bubonic plague, or typhus.

We have plenty of preventative hygiene in the United States and many wonderful modern hospitals and able surgeons and could segregate and take care of such dread diseases.

It is a libel against the American people to say that they are afraid of communist propaganda. Why the Regular Army, National Guard, American Legion, and Veterans of Foreign Wars could, using a Russian word, liquidate all the communists in the United States in a few weeks time, in case of any attempt at a communist revolution.

Just because other nations have recognized Soviet Russia for selfish and ulterior reasons is no reason why we should and, besides, most of them have been sorry. France recognized Russia, hoping to settle or adjust the vast pre-war loans made by the French people to Russia; Italy recognized Soviet Russia, because she wants to buy wheat, coal, lumber, and oil cheaply. England did so because of the platform pledges of the Socialist Labor Party, recently repudiated by the English people. Germany did because prior to the World War she did $500,000,000 worth of export trade with Russia and was in dire need to restore such a near-by market for her goods.

The fact is that the United States, which has declined to recognize Soviet Russia, has done four times as much export trade with Russia since the armistice than she did prior to the World War with the czar's régime, and all the other big nations that have recognized Soviet Russia are doing many times less trade with her.

The Soviet 5-year program, which has for its acknowledged ultimate purpose world revolution, is near collapse for want of capital, and unless American capitalists provide funds and extend loans and credit the famous 5-year program will come to a sudden and startling end, and with it all ideas of world revolution.

Lenin was right when he said that the capitalists will commit suicide for temporary profit; that is exactly what selfish and shortsighted American capitalists have done for sake of greed and 30 pieces of silver, to help build up the 5-year program and bring the forced labor of Russia, paid 20 cents a day, in competition with free American labor, paid $3 a day and upward.

I predict that if the 5-year program succeeds, we will lose a billion dollars annually in our export trade to foreign markets in four commodities alone—wheat, oil, lumber, and cotton—within the next few years.

Soviet Russia is intensely anxious for recognition from the United States in order to float loans, without which her gigantic program of world economic competition, capitalistic ruin, and world revolution will collapse and sink into oblivion.

I shall never vote or urge the American people, through diplomatic recognition, to place the stamp of their approval upon the Godless Soviet Government as long as she continues a relentless campaign to persecute and destroy the Christian and Jewish faiths in Russia. I shall never vote in the Congress of the United States to favor recognition as long as the Communist International is merely a torch in the hands of the Russian Communist Party to cause the economic ruin of free labor, to promote class hatred and the destruction of civil liberties and free institutions throughout the world.

There is, and there always will be, an irrepressible conflict between our republican form of government and communism. No loyal American citizen can serve the red flag and the American flag at the same time. The American Federation of Labor has never ceased to expose the autocracy and despotic tyranny of the Soviet Government. In their annual convention in 1927, the following declaration of policy was adopted: "We regard the Soviet régime in Russia as the most unscrupulous, most antisocial, most menacing institution in the world to-day. Between it and our form of political and social organization there can be no compromise of any kind. We repeat the call to American trade unionists to stand true to their faith, to be militant in their defense of the principles of freedom and justice for which our movement stands and upon which our democracy rests its foundation walls."

I will conclude my remarks with the pithy statement of former President Calvin Coolidge: "I do not propose to barter away for the privilege of trade any of the cherished rights of humanity; I do not propose to make merchandise of any American principles. These rights and principles must go wherever the sanctions of our Government go."

No competent person questions the stability of the Soviet dictatorship in Russia or that it is a de facto government, but the American people will never recognize the Soviet Government just as long as it encourages the Communist International to spread vicious revolutionary propaganda and conduct seditious activities to undermine and destroy free governments in noncommunistic countries, including our own. We will never recognize a foreign nation that seeks to interfere with our domestic institutions. I have refrained from mentioning war debts, seizure of private property, and possible debt settlements, as they sink into insignificance compared to the all-important issue of amity, friendly relations, and fair dealing upon which diplomatic recognition must be based or be meaningless and of no value in international law or among civilized nations.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL FARM LOAN ACT

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6172) to amend the Federal farm loan act, as amended, to provide for additional capital for Federal land banks, and for other purposes. Pending that motion I ask unanimous consent that general debate on this bill be limited to two hours, one-half to be controlled by myself and one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 6172. Pending that motion he asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to two hours, one-half to be controlled by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG]. Is there objection?

Mr. HARE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I am wondering whether we could not have more than two hours' debate on this bill. I think it is a most important bill, and I am just wondering whether or not it would embarrass the House in any way to extend the time to more than one hour on a side.

Mr. STEAGALL. I hope the gentleman will not insist on that for this reason: In the first place, I do not think it is necessary, and there is not going to be any occasion for long debate on this bill. The bill is short, and there is only one proposition in the bill which I apprehend will provoke any sort of controversy. For that reason I hope we can finish the bill in a couple of hours after general debate, which will enable us to get through with the day's work. I hope the gentleman will agree to limit the debate to two hours.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Of course, the bill is very short. It contains only three pages; it only appropriates $100,000,000, and there are some rather drastic and fundamental changes with which some of us will be inclined to agree, but what I want to inquire about is whether when we come to the reading of the bill there will be sufficient latitude and time so that we may have an intelligent discussion of the matters before us.

Mr. STEAGALL. I will say to the gentleman that if it is within my power, he shall have that opportunity as well as all other Members.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 6172, with Mr. RAYBURN in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I should like to have had more time for debate and for consideration of this bill, but we are attempting to go rapidly in order to finish the legislation to-day. We want to give the country an idea of diligence on the part of the committees of the House and the membership of the House in undertaking to meet the serious problems that confront us.

I am not going to take the time at my disposal to review at length the serious situation that affects the agricultural interests of the United States. I am sure all Members of the House, certainly all Members who represent agricultural constituencies, are fully informed of these conditions.

The bill before us undertakes to relieve the difficulties in which the Federal land banks of the country find themselves in the effort to afford the farmers of the country the borrowing facilities intended to be furnished through the Federal farm loan act.

Let me say here that I was one of the members of the Committee on Banking and Currency that framed the original Federal farm loan act. I have always thought, and other Members have always thought, and we see clearly now, that there were some mistakes made in the provisions of that law. The act undertook to set up a loan system that would work automatically. The Government subscribed the initial capital stock of the Federal land banks, each bank having issued to the Treasury $750,000 of stock certificates covering the initial capital stock of these banks. This was automatically reimbursed to the Treasury Department, and I may say that substantially all of it has been reimbursed.

The capital stock owned by the Government, under the provisions of the Federal farm loan act, was absorbed by the borrowers, who, under the law, were required to take 5 per cent of loans in the form of capital stock. There was no provision for the immediate accumulation of reserves in the Federal land banks. Of course, every banking institution or corporation should have proper machinery for the accumulation of reserves. The failure to take care of this at the outset was a mistake and has resulted in embarrassment to the banks.

It was undertaken to put this system to working automatically, and we have found a mistake was made. The banks came upon a situation during the unusual conditions that have prevailed for some time, when they were unable to realize on their mortgages and found themselves without the proper reserves to protect their obligations. The banks can not serve the farmers unless they can obtain necessary funds, and to do that they must sell bonds.

The law requires that the banks maintain solvent mortgages to secure their bonds, because it is only through these bonds that they obtain funds from the investing public with which to supply loans to the farmers of the country, and to function beneficially they must command the confidence of the public who buy the bonds.

And this is the situation: When a mortgage falls due the law contemplates that the safeguards in the matter of security were sufficient that there would be no considerable defaults in the payment of the installments on mortgages, and so there was no machinery. So no adequate machinery was set up in the law by which the officials of the banks could deal with mortgages that had become delinquent in a way to utilize them in their operations. Unless the banks had sufficient reserves with which to supply a substitute form of security back of their bonds, embarrassment of credit was unavoidable; and the banks have not been able, out of their reserves, to afford the necessary security in the form of land bank bonds, Government bonds, or cash.

So to meet the situation they would have widespread mortgage foreclosures that have proved most unfortunate in the midst of the depression and stress through which we are passing. This has resulted in the sacrifice of farm lands throughout many sections of the country at prices that are absolutely destructive to agriculture and have had a most demoralizing effect not only upon land values but upon the entire business structure of the agricultural sections of the country and, in turn, an unfortunate effect, in my judgment, upon the entire economic machinery of the Nation.

During the last session of the Congress, in view of this situation, I introduced a bill providing for the advancement by the Treasury of the United States of the sum of $60,000,000 to the 12 Federal land banks, and in that measure the purpose expressed was "to enable the banks to grant extensions to borrowers in cases where it was to the best interests of the banks and the borrowers to grant such extensions." The Committee on Banking and Currency held extended hearings on that bill during the last session of Congress. It was discussed at great length by Members of the House, by some Members who were not on the Committee on Banking and Currency, and by members of the Federal Farm Loan Board, who went over the whole field with respect to the declaration of policy embodied in the bill.

These hearings are now available for Members of the House. I will say to gentlemen who may be interested that they will find in these hearings the best review of the facts in this matter that are to be obtained, and as good as could be obtained if we had before us the recent hearings that we held in the present week.

Let me say that it was the work done in the last Congress by our committee, in consideration of the bill I had the honor to introduce at that time, which blazed the way and did the preliminary work that made it possible for your committee to report so soon the measure now before you—if, I hope I may be pardoned for saying this, I think all will agree that we have done this work with unusual expedition—due to the fact that the bill before us is in substance and in purpose the same measure as the one introduced by me during the last session of Congress and on which the Banking and Currency Committee held hearings, as I have stated.

The bill before us provides for the advancement of $100,000,000 by the Treasury Department, to constitute a revolving fund, which may be drawn upon by any Federal land bank upon application of the officials of the bank approved by the Federal Farm Loan Board.

Any advancement in that connection is to be covered by subscriptions to the capital stock of the Federal land banks obtaining the advancement, the subscriptions to be issued to the Treasury of the United States.

That capital stock is to be absorbed in part by the borrowers under the provisions of the farm loan act, which provides that 5 per cent of loans are correctly subscriptions to capital stock.

Provision is further made in the bill for repayment in cash of any of these sums to the Treasury in case any bank finds itself in position to repay the Treasury sooner than would be possible through the cancellation of its stock as the borrowers take it.

This advancement by the Treasury is to be without interest charges against the banks.

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I beg the gentleman's pardon, but if the gentleman will let me finish then I shall gladly yield to any gentleman for a question.

Sections 2 and 3 of the bill deal with the matter of accumulation of reserves by the banks. I take it for granted there will be no controversy over the provisions.

Section 2 requires each bank to set aside in reserve 50 per cent of net earnings before dividends are paid, until the reserves equal the amount of the capital stock. After that the bank is required to set aside 10 per cent semiannually.

There is a similar provision which deals with the accumulation of reserves by the farm loan associations. I will simply state in that connection that, so far as I am informed, nobody questions the wisdom of these two provisions which are intended to set up proper machinery by which the banks in their own right can under normal operations accumulate proper reserves. Now, I have outlined briefly what is in this bill, except one additional section. I refer to section 4.

I will say that this section has been discussed quite thoroughly in the committee, both at this session of Congress and in the former session of Congress, not only by Members of the House and members of the committee, but by members of the Farm Loan Board, the Secretary of the Treasury at one time, and others interested in the legislation.

During the last session of Congress we had a number of bills and resolutions before the Banking and Currency Committee touching the matter of the policy of the banks in handling of foreclosures of their mortgages. There were various and numerous suggestions and plans offered which were designed to effectuate a more lenient administration of the banks in connection with their foreclosures. The bill before us has a provision at that point which might be called the result of a working out of differences of opinion which, as it is presented to the House, embodies the combined judgment of the committee. It does not express my views, nor perhaps the individual judgment or preference of any single member of the committee. We thought best to take what we could get and be sure of the final passage and approval of the legislation—the main thing is the money—$100,000,000. The officials of the Federal Farm Loan Board and the Secretary of the Treasury opposed all this legislation during the last session of Congress upon the ground, first, as they insisted, that there was no need for legislation to afford financial aid to the banks, and they also opposed every plan that sought to liberalize the policy of the officials of the banks in the matter of the foreclosure of their mortgages. The bill before us has a provision on that question in section 4, in this language:

> Each Federal land bank is authorized, when in the judgment of the directors conditions justify it, to extend, in whole or in part, any installment or installments upon any mortgage that may be unpaid, and to accept payment of such unpaid installment or installments during a period of five years or less thereafter, to be paid in equal amounts in addition to the regular installments to become due during such period.

The bill does not declare nor seek to declare in this provision a general moratorium as to installments upon mortgages. It confers upon the officials of the banks and the Federal Farm Loan Board the authority to deal with each particular case upon its merits and in a common-sense way and to attempt to administer the banks in connection with their foreclosures, I might say, just as all other banking institutions of which I have any knowledge have always done, which is the practice with all credit institutions.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. In a moment. Without this machinery when a mortgage becomes due, there is one of two courses left the officials of the bank. One is to foreclose and let the farmer start over and the bank take whatever loss may be incurred through the practice of that policy. The other plan, and the only other plan, that is open to the officials of the bank under the machinery of the Federal farm loan act as it now exists is to carry a delinquent mortgage in the suspense account, and that means that such a mortgage, however favorably regarded by the officials of the bank. no matter how valid the security, no matter how many payments have been made, can not be treated in the true sense of the word as an asset, nor carried as security for bonds issued, but must stand suspended in mid-air—unavailable to the bank in the practical conduct of its business. This situation might arise, for illustration:

A borrower might have met 15 installment payments on his mortgage. He might have been born on the farm in question; he might have reared his family there, with all that a home from childhood means to a citizen. There might be only five payments to be made; the bank officers might regard it as among their best mortgage securities, but under existing law there is no power to treat such a mortgage as valid security; they are required to sell that man's home and farm and turn him and his wife and children out, as has been unfortunately done in many instances, involving the losses to the citizen and to the bank with consequent injury and demoralization to the community. Either that, or they must put it in the suspense account, where it it of no value to the bank—and thereby leave the bonds unprotected to the extent of such a mortgage. The provisions of section 4 provide a common-sense way to deal with such a case by spreading the delinquent installments over a period of five years. This helps both the borrower and the bank.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes; I am glad to yield.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Did the gentleman or his committee secure any assurances from any of the officials of the Federal land bank that there would be fewer foreclosures after the passage of this act than heretofore?

Mr. STEAGALL. I have not been in accord with the policies of the Federal Farm Loan Board in so far as they have expressed themselves to our committee.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. I have not either.

Mr. STEAGALL. But it is unquestionably true that under the provisions of this bill the board will have the necessary funds, unless we are mistaken as to the amount required, and if we are mistaken the Congress will have an opportunity to supply that deficiency and furnish the necessary funds, since Congress will be in session for several months; and, if this provision of this bill, section 4, is enacted they will have the necessary machinery to enable them to administer the banks in a common sense way. I think it is fair to the board to say that they recognize that any advancement in the form of financial relief would necessarily be reflected in benefits to the farmers and members of the Farm Loan Board assured our committee this would be done. It would naturally follow that a more sympathetic administration of foreclosures would be had, and in addition to that we will help to revive the market for bonds issued by the banks. I did not go into the matter, but the banks have not been able in three years to float a long-time issue of bonds, such as was contemplated would be done, out of which to get necessary funds for the operation of the system. We are hopeful that the provisions of this bill, with the funds provided and the machinery set up, will bring about a more sympathetic administration of these banks in connection with their foreclosures.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Did any member of the Farm Loan Board come before the committee and give expression to what they intended to do in the future with respect to foreclosures?

Mr. STEAGALL. I think I have answered the gentleman; that the Federal Farm Loan Board expect this to bring about a more sympathetic administration of the banks in connection with their foreclosures. I know the gentleman's interest and I share it with him. However, I must hurry, that I may save time for other Members to express their views.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. On the question of the interpretation of section 4, whether the directors have a right to grant an extension or not; but if they do grant an extension, that extension must be for five years, with the option on the part of the farmer or the borrower to pay in less than five years. Is that the way it is to be interpreted?

Mr. STEAGALL. No. That language is so plain that I think if the gentleman will give it a moment's thought he will agree with me that what we have done is to confer on the banks power to extend installments that become delinquent, and they may extend for five years or less time.

This is not a temporary, emergency measure. It puts the necessary machinery into the law permanently which has been embodied in the original farm loan act.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. I am trying to be clear as to the meaning of section 4. "The directors have a right to extend, in whole or in part, any installment," but as I read it, that extension must be for five years.

Mr. STEAGALL. Or less. The language is "five years or less."

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. No. Now, that is just where I think we do not agree on the interpretation. But, the option is given to the borrower to pay in less than five years.

Mr. STEAGALL. I do not agree with the gentleman in that construction. I hardly think he will find many Members of the House who do. This provision merely sets up necessary machinery to give enlarged authority in handling these matters in a common-sense way.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield.

Mr. STEVENSON. The intention of that language, as plainly covered by the language itself and as put in there, was that they could not extend it for more than five years; but, they can extend it for one year, they can extend it for two years, or three years, or four years, or five years; but the limitation is on the power of the board to extend it for more than five years.

Mr. STEAGALL. That is correct.

Now, I have gone over the bill hurriedly, but I think in a way that makes its meaning clear. The bill is not all I should like to see passed, but it is the best we can get. Above all, it furnishes $100,000,000 for the relief of the banks, and that is the main thing desired. [Applause.]

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 15 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, it is by reason of the very grave importance of this matter that I have asked the attention of the House.

This is the first of a group of measures recommended to Congress at the opening of the session by the President for the purpose of relieving, as far as this Congress can so do, the distress now prevalent in our country. It will be speedily followed by the rest of the group, I am very sure, coming from the Committee on Banking and Currency, to which committee falls the chief burden of responsibility in this juncture.

I need not take time to repeat the reasons why the President in his annual message gave the foremost place to this group of measures, but simply once more impress upon the House, if I can, the extreme importance of the earliest treatment possible of these recommendations.

In this matter there is not a trace of partisanship. In the 12 years I have been a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency I can not recall ever hearing a word uttered or seeing a vote cast from any partisan motive, and I am sure that the committee this year will continue that record of unbiased, unprejudiced attempt to serve the country.

This particular bill is for the most part in the shape submitted by the administration through that part of it concerned with the farm-loan system. I have always been in the fullest sympathy with this system, because it embodies the cooperative idea, the idea to which I look for the greatest contribution that the coming generation will make to the welfare of this land. The farm-loan system has been the first great attempt in our country to help our citizens to help themselves. Because it is cooperative, I seek in every way possible within my own power to help its success, to advance its welfare, in order that this example may in due time be imitated in other lines of social activity and we may thereby make some headway in lessening the great waste now brought about through our distributive processes. To be sure, this particular field of activity concerns itself with production chiefly, but it may serve as an example that will aid other helps to our citizens in the way of cooperative action, the working together that has been the chief fruit of civilization.

This bill would restore to the farm-loan system the capital with which the country supplied it at the beginning. That capital had been repaid, practically all of it, in the ordinary development of the system, but with this unexpected, this unprecedented financial depression, the working capital of the system has been found insufficient, and therefore it is proposed to start the system afresh, with new capital, in larger quantity, to be sure, but evidently called for by the needs of the moment.

I need not go beyond that in the discussion of the bill as a whole, but rather would call to your attention the one point in which there were differences of opinion in the committee. It is found in section 4. This section was inspired by generous sympathy with the unfortunate farmers who can not pay their installments, a sympathy with which I am in complete accord. I admire it, and I would, if I could, approve its expression in this form; but, in my judgment, this form of extending aid to the farmers has an element of grave danger. Unless this language be modified in another branch, it may prove disastrous to the system. It may kill the goose that lays the golden egg, or, to change the metaphor, the farmer may jump out of the frying pan into the fire.

It must be remembered that in all transactions of this type there are two parties concerned, namely, the lender and the borrower. At this moment the lenders of the country are unwilling to furnish the funds necessary for the system to function. If you make it less attractive for the lenders to furnish funds, you may find the bonds of this system going still further down in market value. You may find the system itself ruined.

I call attention to this in order that before the measure becomes law it may in another branch have the adequate scrutiny that we have been unable to give it in our committee. It has been inadequate by reason of our desire to tell the country at the earliest possible moment that we mean to do what the President has advised us to do, in order to melt the frozen credit of the land, which must be the first step toward the return of prosperity.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. With pleasure.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman states that he sees some element of danger in section 4, in that it might ultimately jeopardize the security of the entire bond structure of the system.

I think the gentleman from Massachusetts will candidly admit that every power given inferentially in this new section is already vested in the Federal Farm Board—is not that true?

Mr. LUCE. Some power is already granted, but there is a difference of opinion as to whether every power is granted.

Mr. BANKHEAD. As I see it, the main value from the standpoint of the debtor to the system under this is that it may be in the nature of a mere congressional suggestion to the Farm Board that they exercise more liberality in the future in the extension of these installments than they have in the past.

Mr. LUCE. With the consent of the gentleman from Alabama, I will tell him that another member of the committee will dwell with greater particularity upon this one phase of the question, and I want to go on to another phase of the matter.

Mr. STEAGALL. If the gentleman will permit, my very able colleague is in error as to the provisions of this section. The section does set up additional machinery for dealing with foreclosures. It enables the officials of the banks to take delinquent payments and spread them over one year or five years in equal amounts instead of having to foreclose or transfer the mortgage to a suspense account where they can not count it among their assets.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Certainly.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The giving of $100,000,000 to the 12 land banks as capital will furnish the basis of how much increased loaning capacity of the banks?

Mr. LUCE. I could not tell the gentleman offhand.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Has the committee any estimate of that at all?

Mr. LUCE. Possibly the gentleman from Alabama, when he has time again, may be able to answer that question.

Mr. RAMSEYER. What is the committee's opinion as to the effect this will have on the market price of the outstanding bonds?

Mr. LUCE. The committee differs in judgment on that particular.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Unless the market price of the bonds is brought up to near par, how are you going to float the bonds?

Mr. LUCE. Another member of the committee later on will doubtless convey to the committee the judgment of the Farm Board in that particular. I desire now to go to another phase of the question.

Mr. ADKINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Yes.

Mr. ADKINS. I can understand that a man would prefer to take a 5 per cent bond, and then if he buys other bonds he can not turn those bonds in as payment on his mortgage. Why can he not turn those bonds back if he chooses to do so?

Mr. LUCE. That is a phase of the mechanics of the bill to which I would rather not give any time at the moment.

I want to take this opportunity to remind the committee that in every commercial transaction involving the transfer of money there is a lender as well as a borrower, and also to bring to the attention of the committee that when it fixes its eyes only on the wealthy lenders of this country it ignores the great mass of those whose welfare will suffer if we here enact legislation endangering the fruits of their labors.

To this end I would inform the committee that there are in this country 53,000,000 savings depositors. There are less than 30,000,000 families—about 25,000,000, I presume—so that, allowing for duplicate deposits to the utmost probable degree, when you touch the savings of the country you are affecting the welfare of at least 9 out of 10 families. It happens that I am a director in one of the smaller life insurance companies. My only profit therefrom comes from the occasional fee I receive for attending a directors' meeting. We have something more than $3,000,000 invested in securities scattered among 300 different activities. That $3,000,000 is mainly the property of wage earners for whom we are the trustees, wage earners who are paying in 10, 15, and 25 cents a week in order that they may provide enough money to pay for burial or with which to pay doctors' bills after the last illness. When you endanger the bonds we hold for those people you are endangering the welfare of wage earners, those who make up the great masses of the people of the country. You are not throwing any effective club at the multimillionaire but a club that may come back like a boomerang to strike your neighbor or yourself. Do not allow yourselves to forget that a great part of the wealth of this country is owned by the masses of its inhabitants.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts has used 15 minutes.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself three more minutes.

I am also a member of the corporation conducting a mutual savings bank in my town. As such I do not get even a fee for attendance. We hold ten or fifteen million dollars as trustees, mainly for the wage earners of my city, the wage earners for whose welfare I here plead your recognition.

Did you realize that there are more than $28,000,000,000 in the savings accounts of the people of the land; more than $28,000,000,000 invested by the banks, for the most part, for those in humble circumstances, those in the walks of life that are to-day in the most distress? You may pass some taxation measure that will deprive the wealthy of some degree of luxury, but they will still be able to live in comfort and ease. When, however, you pass a measure that threatens the savings of the people, then you are adding to the calamity through which we are now passing; you are increasing human misery. Therefore I trust that this measure, when it becomes a law, will be in such shape that it will not endanger the savings of the people. [Applause.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, my distinguished friend from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] made an appeal for the people who own the bonds of the farm loan system. I am not going into the general economics of the world but just what this bill concerns.

There are $1,174,000,000 of farm-land bonds outstanding. To-day they are not sufficiently covered because there are many mortgages in default which are not eligible to be kept in their assets as security. You know when a paper is in default it becomes stale, and it has to be taken out of the registry of the bonds that are eligible to be put up as collateral for the bonds. They are $48,000,000 short, so Mr. Bestor told the committee the other day, of enough security to cover the bonds that are outstanding, in so far as the farm bonds are concerned.

Now, what does this bill propose to do? It proposes to do two things: First, to make absolutely sure that every bond that is outstanding is an A No. 1 or gilt-edged security, and, second, to enable the Farm Loan Board, if it will, to extend a little measure of leniency to borrowers who are admittedly unable to pay their installments, although their security is good.

The statement was made before the committee by Mr. Bestor that the price of farm products was such that it was impossible in the cotton country, the wheat country, and the corn country for any considerable percentage of the farmers, who depend on the sale of their products to pay their installments, to pay them.

Now, what do we do for the bondholders? We put $100,000,000 there and take it in stock, and that is an asset which goes right behind the bonds and, if next week the whole business was put into the hands of a receiver, the bondholders would be $100,000,000 better off than they are now, although that is not the principal object of the bill.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. PARSONS. Who are the bondholders?

Mr. STEVENSON. The bondholders are everybody who has investments, as the gentleman from Massachusetts said a while ago.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. In many instances these bondholders have bought up the bonds at 40 or 50 or 60 cents on the dollar. Would they have the benefit of having the bonds which they have so bought brought up to par?

Mr. STEVENSON. I think the gentleman is in error about that.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I am very sure I am not in error about these bonds, in many instances, having been bought at much lower than par.

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not think the Federal land-bank bonds have ever gone that low.

Mr. STEAGALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. STEAGALL. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHIPERFIELD], whose judgment I respect very much, is in error, unquestionably. The gentleman has confused bonds of the joint-stock land banks with Federal land-bank bonds.

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. STEAGALL. Federal land-bank bonds have never gone lower than 76 or 77 or something like that.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I think the gentleman is right.

Mr. STEAGALL. And I will say, in addition, that the Federal land-bank bonds have made a great record for standing up, when all the others in this country were going down.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. The gentleman is correct about that and I was confusing the two issues of bonds; but even so, take the case of the man who bought the bonds at 76——

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not yield further.

Mr. HARE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. I yield.

Mr. HARE. I just want to ask the gentleman, who is a member of the committee, whether or not the committee contemplates further legislation whereby it will require the Federal land banks and the joint-stock land banks to accept their own bonds in lieu of amortization payments or in satisfaction of mortgages?

Mr. STEVENSON. There are measures pending before the committee looking to those two things, but I will call the gentleman's attention to the fact that it is not necessary in case of Federal land banks, because that provision is already in the law. Section 25 provides that when a mortgage is in default for 30 days the association through which it came can be called upon to pay the default, and it may do so either by payment of the amount due thereon in cash or by the substitution of an equal amount of Federal farm loan bonds with all unmatured coupons attached. So there is no legislation needed for that purpose in so far as the Federal land banks with which we are dealing now are concerned; but as to the joint-stock land banks, that is a crying need.

The second purpose of this measure is to relieve, as far as may be judicious, the condition of the landowner who has good security, who has a good farm, who is a good risk, and yet to-day, because of the distressful conditions growing out of the low price of farm products, can not pay his installments.

Now, what do we propose to do? We do not propose to say to the board that it shall do so-and-so. I am a conservative man. I think everybody in this House who knows me knows that. I would not undertake to say to the board that it must extend every man's debt because he can not pay, because that would mean that everybody would stop paying, or that many would stop paying. We have got to leave this to the discretion of the board, and therefore we have put a provision in this bill which, in my judgment, is ample security for the board and preserves every right they have and yet will do two things. It is giving them the authority to renew paper which they have not got now, and giving them the intimation of the mind of Congress that where they have got a man worthy of credit and indulgence under distressing circumstances, to give him a reasonable extension not to exceed five years.

Mr. BURTNESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. I yield.

Mr. BURTNESS. This is a very important provision and I want to ask the gentleman this question: Does this in any way contemplate that it is the only and exclusive remedy existing? What I am getting at is this: Assume that a loan has been cut down from $10,000 to $5,000 by payments; if the situation of the borrower is such that his interest would be preserved by renewing his loan and making a new loan, would this stop his doing it?

Mr. STEVENSON. No. This does not take any right away that the board has now. It does not subtract a thing from the right of the board, but gives the board additional right; and instead of its letting the paper become stale and ineligible as paper to secure bonds it gives the bank authority to renew and amortize it from one to five years.

It gives the board authority to protect the paper, to get the man out of his trouble that he is in, without his fault in many instances. It keeps the paper alive, instead of filling the banks with dead paper—dead mortgages that they can not use as collateral.

Mr. DIES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. I yield.

Mr. DIES. Is there any method of bringing about the distribution of this money?

Mr. STEVENSON. We can not control the discretion of the Federal Farm Board.

Mr. TUCKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. TUCKER. What legal connection has the Federal Farm Board with the land banks?

Mr. STEVENSON. The Federal Farm Loan Board controls the directors of the land banks. Their rules and regulations have to be carried out by the land banks. They govern the land banks much as the Federal Reserve Board governs the Federal reserve banks.

Mr. TUCKER. Then the land banks are in mighty bad company.

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman refers to the Federal Farm Board, which has absolutely no connection with the Federal land banks.

Mr. DIES. What assurance have we that this money will be loaned to the farmers?

Mr. STEVENSON. We have no assurance, except that that is the only thing that they can do with it. They are not authorized to do anything else. We must certainly assume that the Farm Loan Board will favor the farm interests in this country. They are not going to take the $100,000,000 and walk off with it and put it into Wall Street. [Laughter].

Now, this amendment was unanimously adopted by the committee. It reads as follows:

> Each Federal land bank is authorized, when in the judgment of the directors conditions justify it, to extend, in whole or in part, any installment or installments upon any mortgage that may be unpaid, and to accept payment of such unpaid installment or installments during a period of five years or less thereafter, to be paid in equal amounts in addition to the regular installments to become due during such period.

They can allow him a period of 5 years in which to pay, or they can make it 1 year, but they can not make it more than 5 years. For instance, the first proposition in the committee was to make it 10 years or more. We cut it down to 5, which shows the intention of the committee, and the intention of the language, that 5 years is the limit put on the board, and that is the only discretion interfered with in this whole proposition. When that is done the paper is current, it is eligible to go up for bonds, and it is paper that will be regarded as current paper in the world of commerce.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. EATON].

Mr. EATON of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I rise simply to obtain information from the leaders in this great committee upon two or three vital points. First, is it proposed to bring here any legislation devised to restore value to and stabilize the bonds of the joint-stock banks that are now helping to impair the capital of banks and insurance companies throughout this eastern country? Second, are you going to bring here any proposal to merge these various instrumentalities for putting the farmers into debt into one great efficient and economically sound institution that will help avert the most dangerous and difficult problem we have to-day, namely, the foreclosure of mortgages on homes. I am not especially interested in the mechanics of society. I believe that our institutions, financial and political, exist for the making of men, and I have been afraid that these organizations that we have created here from time to time have not succeeded very well in safeguarding the greatest man-making institution in the world—the farm—where a good many of us were born and brought up and learned to work, which latter is not done much nowadays. I hope my desire for information will be satisfied by the gentlemen in charge of this bill.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER].

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, I am deeply interested in this bill now pending before us to provide an additional $100,000,000 for the Federal land banks of the United States. This is one step in the President's 12-point recovery program. Yesterday the leaders of both parties of this House were called to the White House to discuss with the President needed legislation. The President, according to press reports, urged getting three bills through Congress at the earliest possible date. The first bill mentioned was the one that passed the House yesterday; the second bill is the one that is now before the House and which, it is hoped, will be passed before we adjourn to-day; the other bill is the one for the establishment of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, on which the Committee on Banking and Currency is now holding hearings. This proposal is patterned after the War Finance Corporation which was established during the war and revived to aid in the emergency of 1921–22.

These bills, enacted into law, will tend to liquidate frozen assets and turn the tide of deflation. There is no question but that the outstanding cause of our present economic difficulties is the fall in commodity prices. Unless we find a way to elevate the commodity price level we are in for a long period of hard times and possibly great social changes.

The situation that confronts the country and the world is such that we should forget politics and get down to a nonpartisan consideration of the problems that confront us. The country expects us to do that and I believe the Members of this House are getting more and more in the mood to consider legislation from a nonpartisan standpoint. Some of the most important relief measures will have to be considered by the Committee on Banking and Currency. The bill (H. R. 5060) for the establishment of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation with a capital stock of $500,000,000 should receive prompt consideration by Congress. The proponents of the bill express great confidence that if that corporation is established it will have much to do in turning the "tide of deflation and starting the country upon the road to recovery." Eugene Meyer, the governor of the Federal Reserve Board, was before the House Banking Committee yesterday and, testifying for the establishment of this corporation, stated "that the very knowledge of its existence would do more to reassure people in fear than any one other thing." Mr. Meyer, without wishing to make any prediction, did express the hope that the passage of this piece of legislation would result in a higher price level for commodities. Further, a newspaper giving an account of his testimony stated, "He referred to the fact that there was a rise in price level during the period of activity of the War Finance Corporation, after which the present corporation is modeled."

The three great farm organizations, the Grange, the Farmers' Union, and the Farm Bureau, are more united this year on a program of relief for agriculture than they have ever been before in the history of the country. One thing they are all agreed on is that a way must be found to restore the commodity price level to the predepression basis.

There are before the Committee on Banking and Currency four money bills to restore and stabilize the commodity price level, introduced by the following Members of the House, to wit: Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, of Maryland; Mr. BURTNESS, of North Dakota; Mr. STRONG, of Kansas, and myself [Mr. RAMSEYER, of Iowa]. I am reliably informed that immediately following the holiday recess representatives of these three national farm organizations are going to be in Washington and will appear before the Banking Committee of the House to urge prompt congressional action to restore and stabilize the commodity price level.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. There is also a bill by the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. SABATH, very much on the same line.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I am glad the gentleman has called my attention to that. I did not know that Mr. SABATH had introduced a bill on this subject. These bills point the way to raise the level of commodity prices and then to stabilize such prices so as to restore debt-paying and purchasing power to the farmers and other producers. That is the fundamental economic problem before the country to-day. Unless commodity prices are restored and stabilized on a higher price level, other remedies will afford at best but temporary and partial relief.

Most of the debts, taxes, and other fixed charges now burdening farmers and other producers were assumed on the commodity price level of several years ago. On the present low commodity price level payments of these obligations simply can not be met. Banks which have extended credit to farmers and other producers can not collect, and that is the cause for a large number of the bank failures. During the last year and one-half I have devoted much of my time to this problem of restoring and stabilizing the commodity price level. I have served on two committees, each of which has made reports. On this subject I have delivered a number of addresses before farm and other organizations, and I have received letters from all parts of the country urging immediate action. This morning I received two letters from my district which are typical—one, from a farmer, says:

> Hope you will be successful in stabilizing the dollar.

The other one, from a business man, reads:

> I am convinced that there should be some change in our currency system such as you have advocated. I can see no real reason for this depressive depression except the high-priced dollar.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LUCE. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa two additional minutes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. If the commodity price level of the last two years had been where it was in 1926 or the average for the years 1922 to 1928, we would have had very few bank failures during the last year. I now earnestly urge every member of the Committee on Banking and Currency and every Member of the House to study the problem of restoring and stabilizing the price level. As I have stated before, the three great national farm organizations will be here as soon as Congress reconvenes the first of the year, and I believe they will present a united front before the Banking Committee on this fundamental problem.

Mr. EATON of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. I yield.

Mr. EATON of New Jersey. Does the gentleman believe that we can elevate the commodity price level by legislation?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Congress has the power to coin money, and to regulate the value thereof. According to my views, and the views of many others, including leading economists and well-known financiers, the Federal reserve system has the power to restore and stabilize the commodity price level. My bill directs the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal reserve banks to use all their powers to restore the level of commodity prices to that for the calendar year 1926, and thereafter to use all their powers to maintain such level.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Is the gentleman also aware—I am sure that he is—that the level of the purchasing power of the consumer has also been lowered? What is the gentleman going to do about that?

Mr. RAMSEYER. The first step we must take to turn the tide of deflation is to restore the purchasing power of the farmers and other producers. If the purchasing power of the farmers is restored, they will begin to buy commodities that will be produced in factories that are now idle; that will employ labor now unemployed. Agriculture is the basic industry. To restore the commodity price level for agriculture is fundamental. Without the restoration of the commodity price level so as to give farmers debt-paying and purchasing power, unemployment will continue and recovery will be delayed.

Mr. Chairman, with leave to extend my remarks I submit for printing in the RECORD my bill (H. R. 128) to restore and maintain the level of wholsesale commodity prices, which reads as follows:

> Be it enacted, etc., That the Federal reserve act is amended by adding at the end thereof a new section to read as follows:
> "SEC. 21. The Federal Reserve Board and the Federal reserve banks are hereby directed to use all their powers to restore the level of wholesale commodity prices to that for the calendar year 1926 and thereafter to use all their powers to maintain such level. In the exercise of such powers the Federal Reserve Board and Federal reserve banks shall, so far as possible, use as a basis for their computations the same statistics and data utilized by the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the Department of Labor in the computation of its index number of wholesale all-commodity prices."

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG].

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, I am very glad that my friend [Mr. RAMSEYER] spoke on this proposition of stabilization of the purchasing power of money. Everything he says is absolutely true. For six years I have been trying to urge upon the country, and upon Congress, that when a government creates a monetary system it ought to stabilize the purchasing power of the unit of value, and not let the dollar that you borrow, lend, work for, or spend have a purchasing power of 50 cents in one decade and 100 or 75 cents in the next decade. It is unfair to everybody but the speculator.

I have been proposing to correct that situation, and Mr. RAMSEYER and others are now coming in to help. Our plan being to regulate the supply and demand of money through the Federal reserve system, which they have the power to do.

I am glad that the American Farm Bureau Federation, and the other farm organizations, have taken up this proposition. The American Federation of Labor has already indorsed it before our Committee on Banking and Currency. We had long hearings upon this proposition. We had the best economists in this country and in Europe appear before the committee, and I think without exception all the economists who were not in the employ of some great financial institution or some Government agency favored the proposition. Therefore, I want you ladies and gentlemen to think about and study this proposition, and see whether or not it is not time for the American Congress to use the instrumentality which it has, the Federal reserve system, by directing it to use the powers which it now has to stabilize the purchasing power of the dollar.

Now, I want to speak about the bill (H. R. 6172), which is now before the committee. It is part of the national program to build a financial defense against disaster. That is what we are doing. We all know that all summer and fall it was feared there would be a crash in Europe that would affect our institutions, or a greater crash here, so we are offering constructive defenses all along the line. This is to strengthen the Federal land banks. They are perfectly sound. There is no question of their soundness.

Mortgages upon the best farm lands in this Nation are behind every bond issued. They are as good as gold, but in the present situation, with everybody afraid to invest, with all kinds of bonds sinking in their market value, the bonds of the farm-land banks have been affected, and when the bonds of the farm-land banks are below par it is hard to sell new issues. When the Federal land banks can not sell their bonds they have no money to loan to the farmers.

The purpose of this bill is to have the Government, if the directors of the several banks desire, buy any part of $100,000,000 of stock to strengthen the banks, to give them money that the bondholders may know that those banks are sound and good and that they need not have any fear of them. They have been about the best bonds on the market up to this time, and we want to keep them that way. The Government has owned stock in these banks before, and the farmers themselves under the system have paid back every dollar of over $200,000,000 but about $200,000. Now, we propose in this time of stress to put $100,000,000 back into those banks.

Remember that this is not intended to be in any sense a moratorium to the farmers who have borrowed from the farm-land banks, for unless they pay their interest to the banks the banks in turn can not pay the interest they owe on their bonds, and the whole farm-land bank system will fail. This bill is intended to provide needed capital for the banks through having the Government invest $100,000,000 if necessary in the capital stock of the 12 Federal land banks.

Because of the present depression the outstanding bonds of these banks are listed on the market at 73, which though higher than most other bonds does not permit the sale of more bonds to get money to loan to farmers, so the Government under this bill will furnish if necessary $100,000,000 new capital and take stock until the banks can retire the same.

This is one of the propositions submitted by the administration, indorsed by the Farm Loan Board, and introduced by Mr. STEAGALL as a part of the administration's financial program, but there is one exception. Section 4 was not in the bill when presented to Mr. STEAGALL. It is a proposition proposed by him and indorsed by a majority of the committee. The Farm Loan Board has some doubts about it. However, after considerable discussion and thought the committee agreed to it. Let me read it to you.

> Each Federal land bank is authorized, when in the judgment of the directors conditions justify it, to extend, in whole or in part, any installment or installments upon any mortgage that may be unpaid, and to accept payment of such unpaid installment or installments during a period of five years or less thereafter, to be paid in equal amounts in addition to the regular installments to become due during such period.

Now, what does that mean? It simply means that if a farmer who has been making his payments regularly—a good farmer, a man who takes care of his farm and knows how to manage it—finds himself in difficulty because of some condition that has arisen, such as hail, grasshoppers, or drought, and he can not meet his payment due on his mortgage to the land bank, he can go to the directors of the bank and say, "Here is my situation. I ask you to give me deferment for this year's payment and let me meet it in five divided annual payments."

Mr. LEAVITT. Beginning when?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Beginning from that year.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Did any of the officials of the Federal land banks ask for section 4 to go in the bill?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. They did not.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. If they are not sympathetic with section 4 and do not want it in the bill, does the gentleman think they will give it sympathetic administration so as to prevent the present orgy of foreclosures going forward?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. This will be left to the directors of each of the 12 farm-loan banks, and I have confidence that they will carry out the purpose of the legislation.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. But those directors have not asked that it go in.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. No; they have not asked that it go in. They have not been consulted.

My friends, there has been presented to the Committee on Banking and Currency, by some of the Members who will probably address you, conditions in their districts which show a need for deferred payments. Now, we can not pass a moratorium on this proposition, which will extend the payments due the banks. If we did, it would ruin the farm-loan system, because perhaps a majority would ask not to pay their interest; and, if they did, the farm-loan banks could not pay the interest on their bonds and the system would fail. This does not grant a moratorium or defer payments to all the farmers who have given mortgages on their farms. This is solely for the purpose of making it possible to take care of farmers who can not pay their annual installments in an emergency and, in the judgment of the directors of the land banks, are nevertheless good security for their loans.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. Why did you not provide for a moratorium?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Because, as I just explained, it would destroy the system. If there is an emergency, and if there should come a time when some farmer or a dozen farmers or a hundred or more farmers can not meet their payments, why should the farm-loan bank officials foreclose the mortgages, take the men off the farms, and sell them to some other farmers who may not do as well?

So this provision was written into the bill by the committee, and it simply gives the directors of the bank the right, if they think conditions justify, to extend the amount due on the loan for one year and spread it over the next five years; and I can not see how it will hurt any of the banks, bondholders, or anybody else.

Mr. PURNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. PURNELL. What is the practice under present conditions in the event of a default in payments?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Well, various Congressmen report various results in their districts. I have had very little complaint in my district, but I have had a few cases in which I think the president of the bank was rather hard-boiled.

Mr. PURNELL. The statement has been made in the cloakroom, if not on the floor, that the directors already have the authority granted by section 4, and I merely want the gentleman's interpretation of it.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Well, they do have the authority, but the trouble is that if they suspend payments, the mortgage goes into a file where it is in suspense and can no longer be held as security for the bank's outstanding bonds, although the security behind the mortgage may be good.

By the method provided by section 4—if in the judgment of the directors of the bank conditions justify it—the amount due in whole or in part by any borrower for any one year may be extended over the next five years. The bank is protected by the judgment of its board of directors as in all affairs of the bank. This section may make them some additional work but does not impair the stability of the bank if the directors look properly to the value of the security of the loans as I believe they will and should do.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOOPER].

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have no intention of making a speech upon this question this afternoon but merely wish to express my hope that this bill will pass. The Banking and Currency Committee has examined this bill, as it does all bills, in a perfectly nonpartisan manner.

I am not optimistic enough to believe that the bill which is before us here will bring about farm relief or that it will greatly change conditions in the country; but it may be, possibly will be, one of those contributing factors which will help to restore confidence throughout the country. There are so many things which contribute to the condition in which we find ourselves to-day that whatever may reasonably promise relief is desirable, at least as an experiment, and I am one of those who believe that the bill we are about to pass, or which I hope we are about to pass, is an experiment and an experiment in the right direction.

However much confidence the people of the country may have lost in private institutions they still have thorough confidence, I believe, in the Government of the United States; and with the Government of the United States in this manner making it more possible for farmers to retain their farms, foreclosures, generally speaking, will be less likely.

I have strong hope that this bill will meet the purposes for which it was designed. Therefore I intend to vote for it, with the idea that it will, in a measure at least, give relief to agriculture in this country. So I hope the membership of this House will see that this bill goes to speedy passage.

Mr. CABLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOOPER. Yes.

Mr. CABLE. Can the gentleman tell us how many foreclosures there have been under all the banks?

Mr. HOOPER. No; I am unable to state that to the gentleman from Ohio at this time.

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BUSBY].

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the purpose of this measure is to give the Federal land banks the power to do what any practical business man or banker would do under like circumstances. In this unusual period through which we are passing, the Federal land bank finds a number of its borrowers, with splendid farms, with security which in normal times would be entirely sufficient to cover the loans they have obtained—but the unusual times which are upon us makes it impossible for such farmer to carry on and meet his taxes and meet his expenses, as he has to meet them. In many instances his entire farm products and all of the resources he controls will not meet the annual payment that he must raise or else become delinquent. If he is to be sold out at any time, he becomes delinquent and the land banks have no money with which to take care of the bond obligations and the interest on the obligations; this creates a very bad situation.

I take it there is no more fundamental, basic occupation in this country than that of farming, and that the farm must be preserved at all hazards if the Nation is to stand. If we destroy the farm, we destroy the source from which we obtain our food and our clothing. If we drive the farmer out of his home and take over these farms through an organization like the Federal farm land bank, it can not handle them as well as the man who has his home on the farm and has his heart set on making it go, if it can possibly be done.

Mr. CABLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. I beg the gentleman's pardon, but I can not yield. I want to proceed in an orderly way to give the House my views pertinent to this legislation and related questions.

The President has called our attention to the necessary program, as he views it, to finance and encourage home building in the cities. Unless we do something to keep the homes of the people on the farms and to help them maintain their homes on the farms, we are going to drive great numbers out and make many homeless people where now they are well situated and well settled.

It is true that the depression in which we are now engulfed is the cause of the shrinkage of the assets of the farmer and the cause of the failure of banks in the rural sections of the country. No bank ever fails until the community around it fails, because as long as the community stands up the assets are good and the bank is solvent.
